Thoroughly disgusted, Enright determined to quit, but first decided to skate to a little cove in the lake shore on the western side. As he approached the spot he noticed that it was the entrance to the outlet of a small brook, the swift current of which was not yet frozen. The ice in the cove itself was very thin, and looking through its transparent surface he could see that thousands of fish had taken refuge there.

Enright says he was soon joined by Cameron, and another hole was chopped in the ice. Then they lowered a line. No sooner had the wriggling minnow struck the water, according to Enright, than there was a rush of fish from all directions, The bait soon vanished but they hooked no fish.
