HIS COURTSHIP.

Continued from page 3. from MB further questioning. But he instantly checked her. The dismay be felt at the thought of her going away fairly startled him. He was astonished also to find that for the first time in his life he was talking to a young girl with an instinctive ease and nat nrainess. He could not stop now to analyze it.

"I won't ask you another questionif I can help it. Believe me, I haven't meant to press your confidence in mere curiosity, but in my wish to help you, though I won't pretend that you have not made me extremely curious about yourself too. But now-about finding employment for you in town. Would you really make the break with these people here and go to the city if you could get a position there?" The color that had come to her cheeks faded out, leaving them white. She looked grave, almost solemn, as she answered him. "I have weighed it and have talked with Abe, who assures me that, being of age, I am free. My ignorance of the world makes me fearful to go out into it, but I have come to feel of late that nothing which I may encounter in any other mode of existence will be more unbearable to ne than my life here. And so," she oncluded, her eyes drooping and her oice sinking to a lower key, "I have lecided that I will go away."

"Isn't it rather singular," he said, "that Abe should sanction and even urge your going away-he of all per-

"But he does not. He knows nothing of my determination." A startled look came into her face. "You will not tell him," she breathed anxiously.

"I! Well, hardly! But you say it is he who tells you you are free to leave

"He tells me I am free, not to go to town-he never dreams of my doing the house made him turn to glance that-but free to marry him.

"Which you will eventually do? There! Pardon me-I promised to ask you no more question. Now, as to these Morningstars, of course there will be a row when they find you are going. Can you stand up against it? "It will be wearisome," she sighed. "But I shall not falter."

"You are sure you won't weaken when old Morningstar gets at you?" "I am sure," she said quietly.

"He won't easily let you go, you know. You save money for the old skinflint. To spare yourself a struggle with him why don't you get away secretly and let him fight it out with himself after you are gone?"

"I have considered that way of leaving, but I have decided against it. prefer to leave openly. But more than Mr. Morningstar I fear Abe." "I should think so," he agreed. He did or did not reciprocate Abe's devotion. It might be interpreted either way. Her caring for Abe was not more incongruous than some other things about her. Suddenly he decided to tell her what it was her undoub ed right to know-that Hen Mucklehenny's visits were for her, not Ollie It would be interesting also to see how she would take it. Would it prove pleasant surprise to her?

"Perhaps your problem may be solved in an easier way than going to town to earn your living. I'll tell you something. Hen Muckiehenny's visits here have been meant for you, not Ollie. He wants to keep company with you. Perhaps knowing this you may reconsider your purpose to go to

The information made apparently very little impression on her, except to bring to her face a strange look of reariness and sadness.

"Did Hen tell you," she asked in a piritless voice, "that he wanted to ome to see me?"

He observed that she did not say 'keep comp'ny." He wondered why the brightness had so suddenly gone out of her at the mention of Hen "No," he said; "I overheard him tel ell vou." "I've known it," she answered in an minterested tone. "He writes verses ing old Morningstar. I have meant to

"Verses! Hen Mucklehenny!" "Yes. I find them sticking in the loor of the spring house with a bunea of wood violets pinned to them." "They don't appear to have moved ou-the violets and the verses. Are he verses original?" "You may judge." She drew a sheet i paper from her pocket. "I found hese this evening. But you can't read 'em in this light." He took a box of matches from his ocket, struck one and read aloud from he sheet of paper she held out to him:

"I give to you this wiolet In token that we two have met And hope that we already yet Once more again together get."

He turned and looked at her. onder she looked weary and sad! "I would not like to trouble you ith commissions," she said, "but if I may ask a favor of you-you are al vays so kind to me"-

"I?" he said, surprised. "I kind to Her answer was spoken very low No one else has ever been so kind." He was silent from astonishment. She was tearing up little blades of grass at her side with nervous fingers

He waited for her to go on. But she did not. "The favor, Eunice?" Her mournful eyes unveiled an instant and looked at him as he spoke her name, and again his pulse stirred as he met the soft fire of her look "If you should get an opportunity to speak to Hen, will you please tell hi. to quit it?"

"Quit writing poetry?" "He will expose me to the wrath of Ollie and her father and mother, who have set their hearts on him." "And you will not defy them and favor him? Or is it Abe that makes Hen's case so hopeless?"

She gazed at him, her mournfulness changed to utter despair. Was there, then, actually a real case of the heart and not of mere propinquity between her and Abe? Incredible!

Before he could answer the faint sound of a step on the board walk near over his shoulder.

"Talk of the devil"-Eunice sprang to her feet with the primitive instinct of a startled animal, gave one glance in the direction of the approaching footsteps on the board walk and without a word darted away around to the back of the building. Abe stopped short a few feet from the terrace, looking baffled at her disappearance. Then he shuffled up to Kinross.

He looked as though he had just got out of bed. His hair was tousled, his feet were bare, and he wore neither coat nor waistcoat.

"Say, that there was our Eunice settin' alongside of you. Ain't it was?" he demanded aggressively.

"Yes," Kinross curtly nodded, taking a fresh cigar from one pocket and a match from another. Abe had always been abashed in his presence, but his jealousy was evidently giving him unwonted courage. Kinross, feeling a pugilistic rage against him for having driven Eunice away, tingled to use his fists.

"What was she doin'?" demanded Abe in a tone of sullen suspicion. "Doing? Nothing," Kinross responded, blowing a cloud of smoke from his

"What was she here fur, then?" "Because she chose to be, I suppose. "She went up to bed when I did a'ready. What fur has she snuk down

"I might ask the same question of you, Abe." "I heerd her when she snuk downstairs. So I put some things on and

"What for?" "I conceited I'd see what she was up to anyhow." "Yes?" said Kinross in an absent tone, pushing back his hat and blow-

"So did I." "What fur did she want to do that there?" Abe angrily demanded.

"It was queer taste, Abe, wasn't it?" "She's my girl, and you ain't to spoon with her!" "Go to bed, Abe," Kinross advised

"I took notice she run off mighty quick when she heard me comin'," he said, with dark suspicion.

"Not very flattering to you; that's a fact." Kinross conceded
