HIS COURTSHIP.

Continued from page 3. "Why need you care for that?" "But they would stop my coming in the future. I have kept them from knowing these many years."

"These many years? You have been in the habit of coming to this room?" "Every night for many years."

"Aha!" he exclaimed. "Then you are the ghost! The flickering light seen at the windows by passersby is your candle!"

"Yes." "What did you come for?"

"To read." He sat upright in his chair. "For many years you have been reading the books in this room?"

"Yes." He stared at her for an instan spellbound with astonishment. Then he sank back in his chair, fitting together the tips of his fingers, a habit of his when trying to think things out. "I see," he said slowly. "I see."

He asked her a question abruptly. "Why would the Morningstars stop it if they knew?"

"They would think it made me les strong to work for them-staying up at repeated anxiously.

"I had great fear. But my longing to it be?" read the books was even greater." "Your refusal to tell me the other suggested. evening how you 'came by' the 'few books' you had read-you were afraid I might betray you?"

"Always the great dread has been upon me of having this only pleasant thing in my life taken away from me. It has made me cautious. But I would trust you now," she said with a restrained eagerness, "with any secret I had-I would trust you to-to the ut-

"Thank you, Eunice," he answered gravely, an odd feeling of pleasure stirring in his heart. He drew himself up and leaned toward the bookcase, examining in the light of his new knowledge their titles. "So then it has been your secret reading that has made of you such an anomaly in the midst of these Morningstars. Living among them, but never of them, your real life has been spent in the world of fiction and history and poetry. Yes," he nodded, "I begin to see daylight now." As a psychologist he felt an almost exciting interest in her as a case to be studied, with her peculiar mental equipment of a really extensive knowledge of literature, combined with an absolute ignorance of actual life, and the affectional and emotional side of her nature left utterly dormant.

"Will you tell me," she timidly urged, "whether you have been told the story of this room? I know there is a story connected with it, but it has always been kept from me."

Although Kinross held it to be an old fogy notion that a girl should be guarded from all knowledge of evil yet he had an instinctive aversion to pouring into the ears of this childlike maiden the story of the crime which Mrs. Morningstar had related to him. On second thoughts, however, why should he hesitate when she had nerves steady enough to meet a ghost and a will so firm that in all these years she had kept the secret of her surreptitious reading, unconsciously educating herself thereby possibly far beyond what many a girl gained from a systematic schooling? Surely the girl had "race" back of her, with her courage to face a ghost, her love of boo's so strong as to overcome obstacles that would have daunted any ordinary character and her native refinement of thought and instinct which he felt in her presence so keenly. But he bethought him of another reason why he did not wish to repeat to her at once Mrs. Morningstar's tale. There was the paper he had thrust in to his pocket at the sound of her step in the hall bearing that "confession." Until he had read that he would rather tell her nothing.

"Will you wait," he begged her, "and let me think it over first before I tell you what I know? Believe me," he added as he saw her look of disappointment, "that I hold your welfare sacred and that in asking you to wait I do what seems to me to be for your

He was surprised at the glow which irradiated her countenance at his words. She was so unused to being considered, he reflected, that a mere tone of kindness called forth all the latent brightness of her soul. Little did he dream how his words sang in her ears, "I hold your welfare sacred." and that the music of the spheres could not have seemed to her more wonderful in spite of the fact that since that night on the terrace her heart had been heavy with the knowl edge that he loved Georgiana.

"I will wait." she said, an unwonted thrill in her voice that held him with its spell, "until you are ready to te!

A disturbing possibility had suddenly occurred to him. Surely if that "confession" amounted to anything Eunice would herself have found it out. He had supposed that he had come upon a discovery, and he felt a pang of disappointment as he realized the probability of his having been mistaken.

"Those books on the top shelf, those Balzacs," he suddenly said. "they were ifre came to him to take it out and read it with her, but he thought better of it. "You know nothing really of yourself-your name, your origin, your life before were left here with the Morningstars?"

A pensive droop to her lips as sh shook her head was her answer. After a moment she looked up at him, her eyes almost solemn as she spoke. "You say it is for my good that you withhold for the time what you know of this room. It is, then, as I have often suspected, bound up in some way with my life?"

He hesitated an instant. "Let us not speak of it just yet, Eunice."

"Very well," she acquiesced gently. "I have so often wished," she added, "that, if inanimate things can really take on impressions from the lives of the people that use them and afterward give out those impressions, this place would speak to me of its his

It was not to be wondered at that her ideas were thus fantastic, he thought. The effect of her desultory reading upon one who lived a life as isolated from the world as a nun's and whose mind was left undisciplined by night. You will not tell them?" she any other mental exercise was so curi- the sugar added to it, for this helps ous as to be almost phenomenal.

"But do you know how soon you can tell me?" she asked.

"Probably the next time we can alone together. And don't let it be week from now. When and where shall

"In this room tomorrow night?" s

"Can't you come to me on the ter race again?" he proposed, quite unwilling to expose her to the scandal which must arise if they were found alone in this chamber in the small hours of the way fatal to smoothness.

"We would not be interrupted or in any way disturbed here," she said, her clear eyes so innocent of any impropriety in her proposal that he would no more have suggested it to her than he would have offered poison to a

"You know," she added, "they all have great fear of this part of the house. On the terrace we might be seen. Abe"-

She stopped short as though to ward off an anathema upon Abe.

But Kinross realized that perhaps she was right. They ran little or no risk of interruption in this room.

"Let us meet here, then, tomorrow night, and I will tell you what I can." He was conscious of the fact that in the course of their talk she had seemed to him like one roused out of a long torpor, like a drooping wild flower reviving under a soft rain. "Do you know, Eunice, it isn't truewhat you told me the other night-that you 'have no education.' You have read and, I have reason to believe, assimilated the best of English "You call me educated?" she asked.

"Technically an educated person is no doubt one who knows the multiplication tables. I am not sure that you She shook her head sadly. "No," she humbly acknowledged. "And I can't spell either." "Your education is dreadfully one sided," he said, smiling. "But take comfort. This is the day for special ties. I believe that your knowledge of English at least is rather thorough."

"Would it serve me in supporting myself?" she eagerly asked. "Surely. The wonder to me is that you have not through some occult process learned to read those Balzacs." She looked at him doubtfully. "You never even glanced into them?" "Long ago I used to take one down occasionally and wish I could read it." Had it been fortunate or unfortunate for her, he wondered, that she had missed this "confession" in his pocket? That remained to be seen, and he was eager to be alone in his toom to read it. He felt a reluctance to bringing this interesting tete-a-tete to an end, but he must without delay be alone to read the secret in his pocket. He rose from his chair.

"It's getting awfully late, Eunice. I'd better go now. We will meet here tomorrow night then? At what time?" "I can come as soon as Ollie falls asleep. She was restless tonight, and it made me late. She is usually quiet by half past 8 at the latest."

"I shall be waiting for you here a that time. And now I think you'd better get some rest and not stop here to Without rising from the bed she laid her slim fingers in his, and he clasped them for an instant as he looked down into her eyes upraised to his. There was something in her passionate gaze, "pure as very fire," which set his own pulse to bounding and which made him feel for the first time in her presence the full force of a fascinating personality, the charm of a most sweet womanhood.

He clasped her hand almost flercely, then turned away abruptly and went from the room.
