Frost Gate Frames Are Welded - Not Coupled

Frost Gates are made of Steel Tubing. In every other Gate this Tubing is connected by threaded joints. These threads cut half-way into the Tube.

Every inch—hinges, latches, and all—are put through this same Galvanizing process. The Frost Gate will now fight off rust.

This deep thread-cutting deprives it of one-half of its former strength. And when subjected to strain, away go those threaded joints.

But the Frost Gate has no couplings. It is welded together. The severest strain will not separate this Welding.

All Frost Gates have a Galvanized finish—not an imitation paint.

The Frame, when bent or shaped, is scoured clean of grease and scale.

The Zinc Galvanizing will now adhere permanently to this thoroughly cleaned Gate Frame. And the Zinc not only spreads over the surface but goes into it, becoming a part of the Pipe itself.

or many, many years, and last longer than any other Gate we know of.

The finish of the Frost Gate is beautiful. It is smooth and silvery, and makes the Frost ornamental as well as useful.

When ordering, don't merely ask for a metal Gate. Say you want a Frost Galvanized Gate.

The Wire used in the Frost Gate is No. 9. This Wire is made and Galvanized by ourselves. It is the strongest Wire of its size in use.

CHAPTER XVI.

SEATED on the side of his bed, his lamp burning on the bureau at his elbow, Dr. Kinross, in the small hours of the morning, read the paper he had found in the haunted room.

Both the wording of it and the penmanship gave evidence that the writer was a person of some education, though at times her phraseology was stilted, bookish and even a little melodramatic.

The child, Eunice, is not ours. For the sake of the money reward which we knew would undoubtedly be offered for her recovery by her wealthy father, we stole her away from her home. Her mother died at her birth, and I, being a trained nurse, was employed by the father to come into the house and take entire charge of the baby. When she was a year old I secretly married her father's secretary, whose learning and brilliant talents attracted me almost to the point of hypnotizing me, and together we hatched the scheme of extracting money from the father. But an unforeseen event thwarted our well laid plan. On the very night of our flight with the child her father was killed in a railroad accident. Somehow the story got out that he had his child with him, and the mutilated body of a year-old girl was actually found in the wreck and identified as Eunice by some of the servants of the household. In this turn of affairs his entire large fortune went to the half sister of Eunice's father, a single woman of about thirty who lived alone in Washington.

We wrote to her and told her what we had done and offered to give up the child for a certain sum, but whether she didn't believe us or whether it served her purpose better not to have the child recovered I do not know. We have never had any answer to our copy on communications to her. It is now four months since we came away with the child, and we have accomplished nothing.

We are living here incognito on this side of the way Pennsylvania farm.

It is my wish to take Eunice to her aunt. The lady has seen the child several times in her visits of a few days each to her brother's home in New York, and of course she would remember me as her caretaker. She always seemed very fond of Eunice, who is her namesake. I do not believe she would deliberately do her the wrong of keeping her out of her inheritance. If I do not soon take Eunice to her the child will have changed her recognition. I cannot longer endure the burden of the crime I have committed. I must make amends. But my husband will not let me expose us both to the risk of punishment, and he still hopes to make profit out of the child. He says he will murder me before he will let me confess our crime. I never would have done this wrong of myself. I have been led into it through my insane passion for this diabolically clever and conscienceless man. Tonight must decide my fate. I shall either depart for Washington with the child or else I shall die either by my own hand or that of my husband. I leave this confession, which I trust will escape my husband's eye and fall into the hands of honest people.

I shall now write every fact which may serve to restore Eunice to her rights. The sum of $4,000 which I took from my employer's desk the night I fled will be found pinned to the child's clothing, to be used in paying the expenses which may be involved in restoring her to her aunt or, in case of failure to prove her identity, to support her until she is able to take care of herself.

"Four thousand dollars!" mused Kinross, his face pale with the excitement of the story. "The yearly interest of that sum would have more than paid the girl's board in this meager household. And they have made a slave of her, not even allowing her to go to the public school!"

He felt a ghoulish gleam in the thought of confronting old Morningstar with his discovery.

He read on:

The father of the child was the late S. S. Wolcott, Esq., of the New York city bar. His half sister is Miss Eunice Wolcott of — avenue, Washington.

Miss Wolcott can identify the child by the two tiny moles on her neck just under her left ear, for I once heard her say when she had to rely on her legs that Mr. Wolcott had two moles in exactly the same spot.

The little necklace and locket which will be found on the child were given her by Miss Wolcott and contain her photograph and the child's.

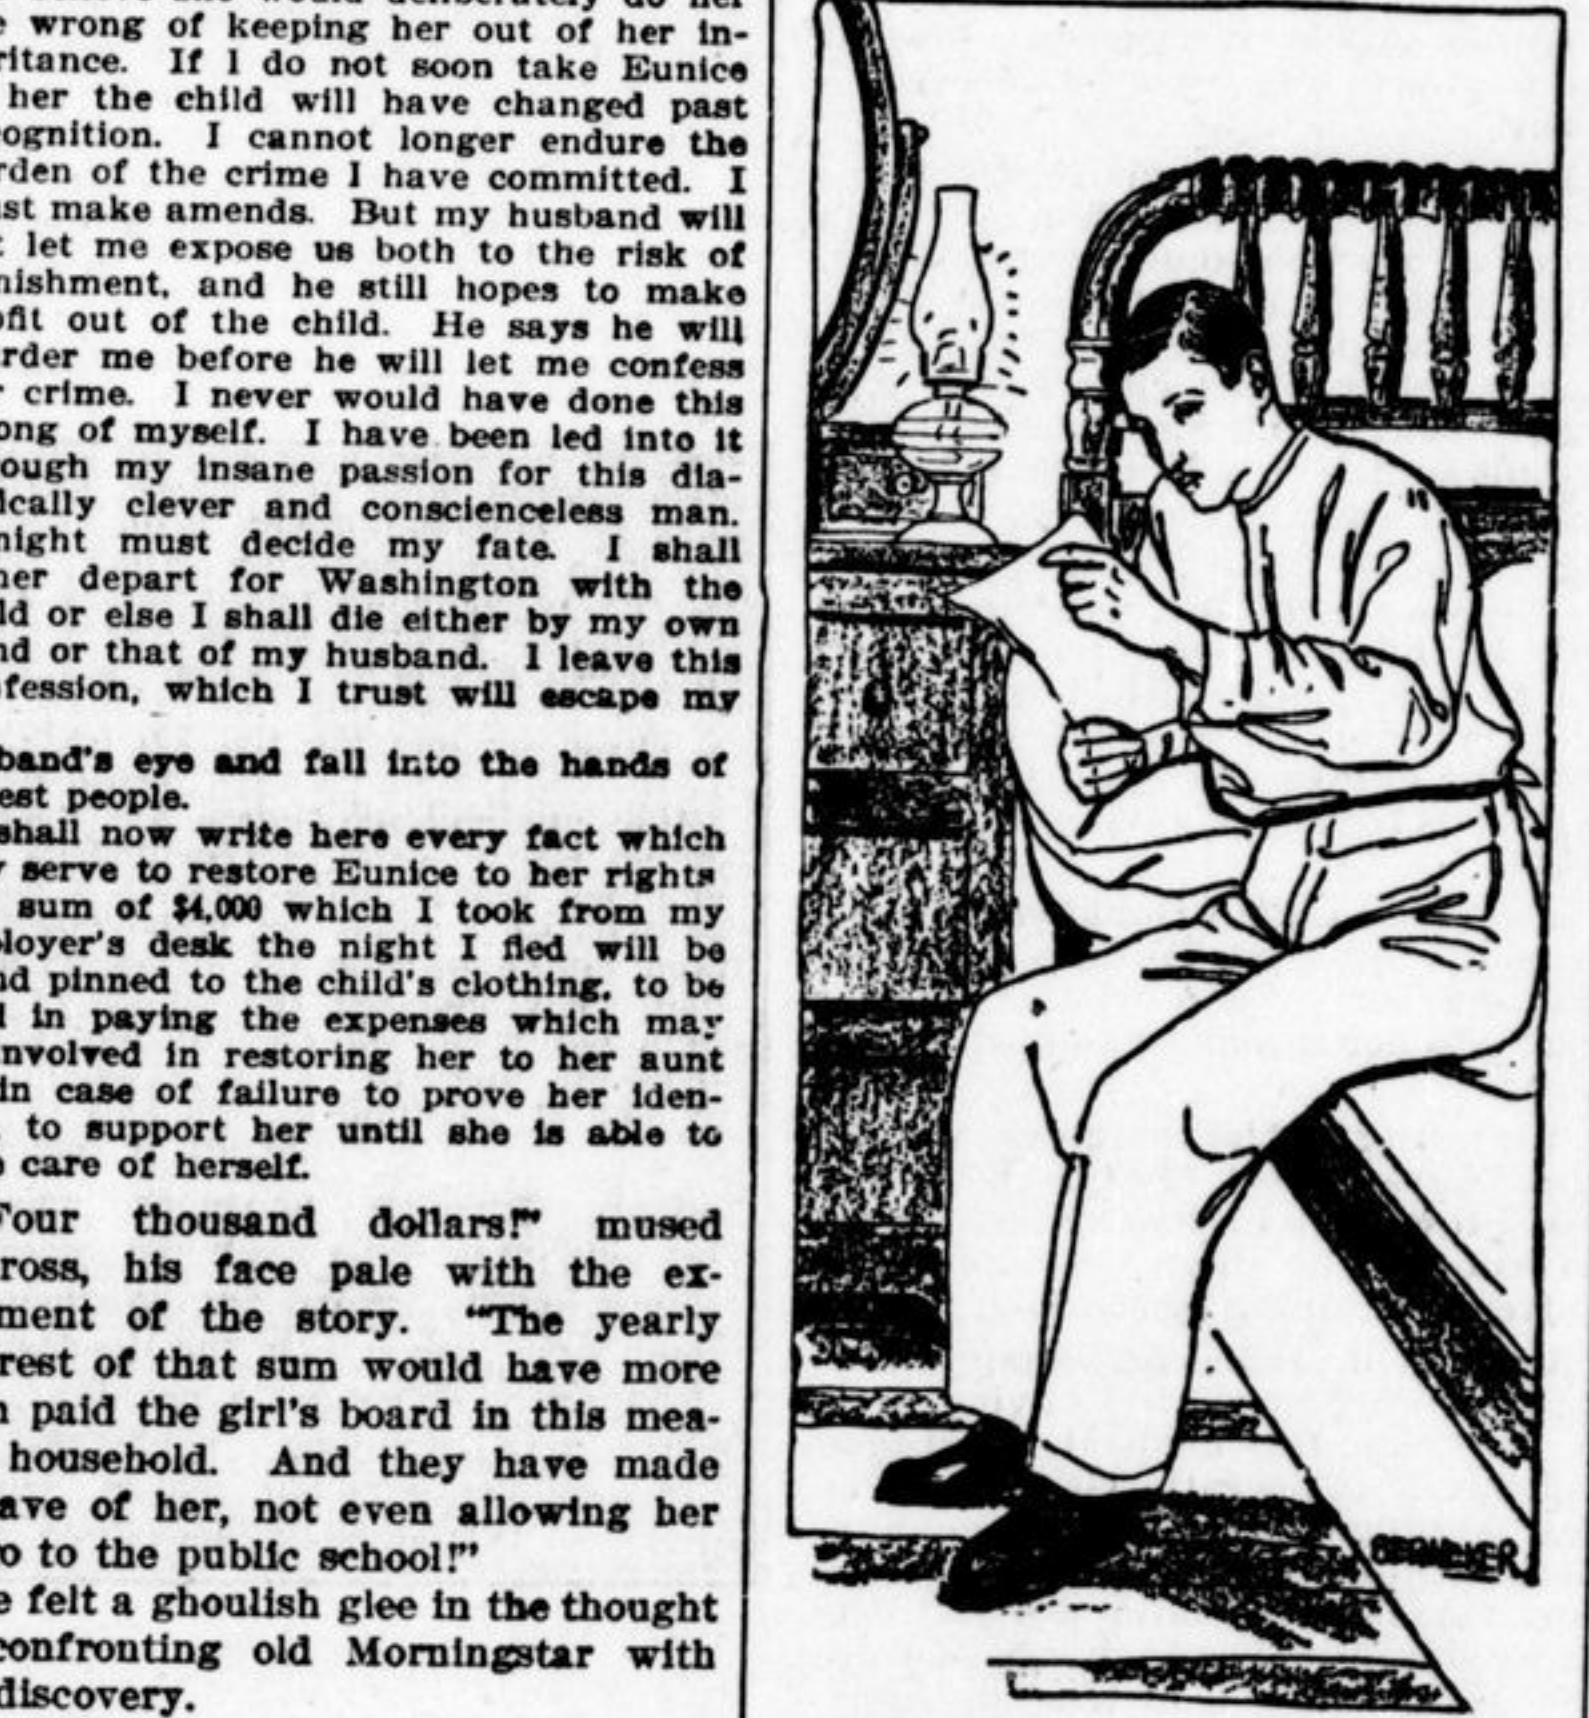

I solemnly affirm that what I have here written is true.

BEATRICE DANIELS.

A date twenty years back was affixed to the paper.

Kinross' heart thumped in his breast, and he sat transfixed as the hand which held the paper fell to his knees.

Eunice was the niece of Miss Eunice Wolcott, whom he had known all his life. They had lived neighbors in the city of Washington. Eunice a Wolcott! Incredible! The foster child of the Morningstars a Wolcott, than whom a prouder race had never developed out of that boat load of immigrants that the Mayflower had dumped on Plymouth Rock! Eunice was an heiress if her identity could be proved, and Miss Wolcott would own her. He suddenly saw, with clearness, the plight of Miss Wolcott in this discovery of her niece, and a cold fear crept over him that there might be some difficulty in restoring to Eunice her inheritance. It would have been difficult enough if it had been attempted at the time this confession was made. But after all these years? He had been a youth of eighteen when Miss Wolcott had come into her fortune, and he remembered well how it had changed her mode of living from a style of modest dignity to a luxurious elegance. How, after all these years of lavishness, could she go back to a simple habit of life? And then the hurt to her pride of race (which in

Seated on the side of his bed.

Yet he found himself just now, perhaps, inconsistently patting himself on the head for his perspicacity in having recognized that Eunice was of no common stock.

He himself had no doubt of the truth of the "confession" and of Eunice's identity with the stolen child. But while the moral evidence seemed clear and convincing, would it be sufficient without the legal proof which he recognized was lacking to persuade Miss Wolcott of her duty to give up a fortune after nineteen years' possession of it? Here would be a test of the "good blood" of which she was so proud.

"It would be more than common honesty; it would be heroic. But if she 'takes after' her niece she won't lack the heroism!"

The fact that the communications to Miss Wolcott of Beatrice Daniels, the trained nurse, had been ignored did not promise well for Eunice's case just now.

Kinross threw himself back on his pillow and clasped his hands under his head. No use to undress—he couldn't sleep. The thought of this girl, brought up as a servant to the Morningstars, her marriage to their son opposed because her poverty made her "not good enough for our Abe," her ignorance of life combined with her knowledge of books making her unique to the point of being pathetic—this young creature to suddenly find herself a great heiress. The speculations which the situation gave rise to drove sleep far from his brain. Would she be good enough for "our Abe" when her story was known? He chuckled when he thought of old Morningstar's earnest endeavors to hang himself, metaphorically speaking, by opposing his son's marriage to a great fortune. "She may imagine she's in love with

Do You Ever Make "Jelly Roll," Madam?

When we were just about so high, ours was an insatiable sweet tooth for "jelly roll" and such like. Sometimes, however, the cake wouldn't roll right, broke on the turns—mother was "unlucky" those days, and the keen critics didn't insist on the biggest piece. Mother, you see, didn't know flour—took whatever the grocer offered—also took her chances.

Do YOU ever make "jelly roll," Madam? Is it always a perfect oval, even layers of light porous, golden crumb, without streaks or holes unsightly? Why doesn't it roll over softly and smoothly; why does it crack and break in spite of the careful flaps behind the dainty napkin? All on account of the ignominious "cussedness" of cheap flour.

There's an elasticity, Madam, a coherence in FIVE ROSES flour responding to your every effort. The strength and fineness of FIVE ROSES hold your batter together in the long well-greased pan. Bakes evenly, giving smooth texture, soft, golden crumb, spongy, porous and yielding—no holes nor lumps to vex the soul.

And when you turn it out on the damp napkin and spread the under side with jam or jelly—it doesn't get soggy soon nor crumbly.

And when you roll it gently, while the kidneys watch this most critical proceeding, there is no crack nor break in the perfect smoothness of the surface—'tis a perfect roll.

Mighty hard to make "jelly roll" like that, Madam, and it's impossible with starchy quality flour. But it's easy if you use FIVE ROSES. Easy to make melting puff paste, flaky pie crust, toothsome rolls and goodies galore. Be flourwise, Madam, join the millions using FIVE ROSES. If you are accustomed to cheap flour the results will seem like magic. But you must use FIVE ROSES.
