Canada's Birthday

AFTER FORTY-THREE YEARS OF A UNITED DOMINION SHE FINDS HERSELF CLOSER TO THE MOTHER LAND THAN EVER BEFORE AND AN AMAZEMENT TO THE NATIONS—STORY OF CONFEDERATION.

Canada, Canada, land of the maple, Queen of the forest and river and lake, Open thy soul to the voice of thy people, Close thy heart to the music they make.
Bells chime out merrily,
Trumpets call cheerily,
Silence is vocal and sleep is awakel

Canada, Canada, land of the bravest, Sons of the war-path, and sons of the sea,
Land of no slave-lash, to-day thou art a slave Millions of hearts with affection for thee
Bells chime out merrily,
Trumpets call cheerily, Let the sky ring with the shout of the free.

Canada, Canada, land of the fairest, Daughters of snow that is kissed by the sun, Blending the charms of all lands that are rarest, Like the bright cestus of Venus in one.
Bells chime out merrily,
Trumpets call cheerily,
A new reign of beauty on earth is begun.

—John Reade.

Only a few weeks ago all the Empire was with the news that at last after a long weary period of negotiation, the several states of South Africa had amicably settled their differences and had formally signed the Union agreements. Just a few years since the Australian provinces did the same thing and made out of their broken

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.
He was the man who realized the Value of a Provincial Union and threw himself into the work of bringing it about. His was the task of taking charge when the work was complete, and steering the new ship of State.

up, jarring communities one great commonwealth.
And Canada, the elder sister looked on with interest, for it was a moment of satisfaction to her in all the glory of her forty odd years of confederation, to watch the younger units of the British Empire solving their problems of nationhood along the same lines as she had followed.

A Difficult Task.

It is no easy task, this one of peaceful federation and a couple of generations ago there were very wise men who said it could not be done. Federalism under the monarchy was impossible, they declared. With widely divergent interests, the provinces would never hold together, their desires would conflict and they would be eternally falling out. Thus much in Canada. Over in the Mother Country there were men who said that federation of the provinces meant the end of the tie between Britain and her north American colonies. They would combine, gain strength enough to stand alone and some day the Government-General would be sent packing.
That was half a century ago. Only a decade ago, clever scientists said that men would never fly with a machine heavier than air. To-day men are doing it. And to-day, aged forty-three years—mere infancy as nations count their years—Canada stands firm in every member, the lustiest child among the nations. The tie with her mother, that was adjudged so fragile is stronger than it ever was in the day of isolated colonies, where expensive governors and their suites were sent—frequently to misgovern.

Durham's Attempt.

It was a big and intricate problem which faced any man of the first half of the century who should try to make a united Canada. Lord Durham made the first effective attempt at it. In those days there were two classes of people, the people and the officials, who were a little bit better than the people and had control of the government. These men constituted the Family Compact of blessed memory to the school-boy. When the uprising in 1837 against the abuses of the system had been quelled, Lord Durham reported to Great Britain on the state of affairs in the colonies and among other things he recommended that the provinces be united. There was a shout of disapproval from the seign-iors of Quebec and the gentry of Ontario, but in 1841 they regretfully watched the union of Upper and Lower Canada. Even so little was a step. The Maritime Provinces stood aloof from the union for various reasons, some of which are quite obvious when one considers the state of the country at the time. The coast country had little in common with the inland provinces. There were no railways to link them up either commercially or sentimentally, all Lower Canada with its French lay between the two English-speaking sections, and, after all, the Bluesnoses were a self-contained little nation all by themselves with their shipping and their timbering and their farming and their culture brought up by boat from Boston.

East Stood Aloof.

With a bit more of imagination at their disposal they might have foreseen that the centre of population was going to go far west, and that they would have to get an early start to be the gateway for the vast reaches of land that expanded to the Rockies.
But they looked upon the prairies as a waste of snows, sparsely inhabited by strangers and too cold to ever amount to anything. A pardonable error after all, and one that has been made many times since with less justification.

So they stood aloof and watched the result of the Anglo-French combination. It did not thrive very well. Ontario was growing rapidly and Quebec was standing still. The representation in the Union Legislature was unfair to the new-comers in Ontario, and, dreading that the Upper Province should get any more voices in the assembly, the French members discouraged immigration.

It was now that men began to realize the necessity for a wider federation, which would help to solve the eternal see-saw of the two races. And here, too, was developed the idea of the Provincial Legislature, which is after all the secret of the success of the whole federation system. When the Union Parliament met the members came forty-two versus forty-two, the representatives of each race bearing a sheaf of bills for its own development and the result was a deadlock. How long this could last today is a problem, but in the days of the Union it lasted for twenty-three years, from 1841 to 1864.

The Work Begins.

In that year was begun the serious work in behalf of the assembling of the provinces, which resulted three years later in the achievement of a Dominion of Canada.

The Maritime Provinces—Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island—began to see the advantage of combining their forces—just the three of them. So they arranged for a convention at Charlotteton. Amongst the men who gathered there were some whose names have become household words throughout the greater Dominion. From Nova Scotia came Charles Tupper, W. A.
Henry, R. B. Dickey, Jonathan Mc-Cully, and Adams G. Archibald. From New Brunswick were Samuel G. Tilley, J. M. Johnson, J. H. Gray, E. B.
Chandler, and W. H. Stevens. Col.
Gray, E. Palmer, W. H. Pope, G. Coles and A. McDonald represented Prince Edward Island.

About this time things were becoming acute in the Union Parliament and George Brown, editor of The Globe, had a committee appointed under his chairmanship to consider a way out of the difficulty. The result of the deliberations was a recommendation that a federal system with separate local houses be founded or that a more comprehensive scheme of union of all the British North American provinces be arranged.

Brown Intervenes.

By reason of his disagreement with the policies of both parties, Brown was a bit of a pariah at the time.

EARL OF DURHAM.

port in 1838 foreshadowed the merging of the Provinces and resulted in and when at last the worst crisis was reached he came forward with the olive branch which he tendered to both leaders or to either. These were the great Macdonalds, akin by name but mortal enemies in politics, the first, Hon. Sandfield Macdonald, Premier, and the other John A. Macdonald, leader of the Opposition, a man destined to become the Premier of the Dominion and foremost statesman of his time. John A. saw the trend of the affairs, and he was quick to take the proffered twig of olive. At a historical meeting in Quebec he and Brown met and settled their differences.

They formed a coalition Government and for the first time since 1841 approximate peace reigned.
Then came the Charlottetown convention. This was the long sought opportunity. Permission was asked for an Upper and Lower Canadian delegation to attend the meeting, and when it was granted, eight members headed by Brown and Macdonald went down the St. Lawrence in the Government steamer Victoria. The old feeling still existed, however, and the eastern representatives declared that they were not authorized to discuss the larger union. The conference decided to wait till October when they could get new instructions from their respective Governments. But when adjournment was taken the Confederation plan was as good as won. And just to show by what little things big issues are directed, the thing that turned most of the eastern delegates in favor of a full union was the iron-ble they foresaw in deciding which of the Maritime Provinces should have the capital.

The "Thirty-three."

In the month of October, 1864, there met in the ancient city of Quebec thirty-three men who constituted the most important conference in the history of Canada. They were all veteran statesmen, twelve from Ontario and Quebec, five from Nova Scotia, seven from New Brunswick, seven from Prince Edward Island and two from Newfoundland. Sir E. P. Tache was elected president of the gathering.

For eighteen long days the debate was carried on behind closed doors, and what difficulties arose are known only to the delegates, but at last things were smoothed over, and when they adjourned confederation was advanced a stage. It was not yet settled down east. In Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. In the first named province the objection was that they did not receive a sufficient proportion of the Dominion revenue to meet the expenses of government. They therefore shelved the whole matter. In New Brunswick feeling ran high and an anti-unionist Government was returned. The Lieutenant-Governor, however, took the matter in his own hands, and in a speech favoring union he rallied around him all the supporters of the project. The Ministry resigned, a general election took place and a unionist victory was secured.
This sudden change had its effect on the Nova Scotians and its Government again approached the subject.

A Long Debate.

When the upper provinces met in February, 1865, confederation was the sole topic. Lord Monck advised the House to give the matter its most serious consideration and when the speech from the throne was put into debate tongues wagged loud and long. It is doubtful if the speakers put as many words into it as were put into the naval debate last session, but one chronicler says that the report of the discussion took up one thousand octavo pages.

Finally the address was adopted by a vote of ninety-one to thirty-three.
Backed by the enthusiasm of his Excellency the Governor-General no time was lost and Messrs. Macdonald, Brown, Cartier and Galt were at once dispatched to England to press the scheme before the home Government.

Lord Palmerston, who was then in power, was only too glad to help, but refused to coerce any province. He promised, however, a financial guarantee for the building of the Intercolonial Railway, the completion and equipment of the fortifications at Quebec, and possession of the northwest territories on condition that the Hudson Bay Company should be properly recompensed. The envoys came home to Quebec and carried the joyful news to the Canadian Parliament which met in August, 1865, and then the unionists sat and waited as patiently as they could.

The London Meeting.

When at last the turnover took place in New Brunswick another conference was arranged for and in November, 1866, sixteen representatives, five from each of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and six from the inland Legislature gathered at the Westminster Palace Hotel in London, Eng., to draft the bill that was to unite the four provinces. In deference to the wishes of the maritime delegates some changes were made in the resolutions of 1864. Consultations were also held with officers of the British Government.

The Earl of Carnarvon introduced the measure into the House of Lords on February 7, 1867, and it passed through all the stages there within the month. The Commons took it on March 4, and after a very brief debate on the second reading it was passed on to the Lords again and received the signature of Queen Victoria on March 29.

July the First was named as the birthday of the new Dominion of Canada and so proclaimed. The bill which made it so has passed into history as the British North America Act.

Reorganization.

Now came a reorganization. Viscount Monck, who had done so much for the cause of Confederation, was appointed Governor-General of the Dominion. There were four names mentioned for the Premiership. Sir Narcisse Belleau, Premier of Old Canada, was given the place of Premier of Lower Canada, now Quebec.
George Brown was too uncertain a proposition to suit most persons at the time. He had quit the Government at a crisis and had expressed his entire disapproval of coalition methods. The choice lay between Cartier and John A. Macdonald, and Viscount Monck chose the latter to twelve lieutenants whom he had tried and proven.

Then there was a distribution of royal honors, out of which John A.
Macdonald secured a knighthood, Cartier a baronetcy, and companiships of the bath for five others who had signally interested themselves in the work of uniting the provinces.

And so was the nucleus of the federation formed.
The next addition to the family of provinces was Manitoba, three years later—in 1870. The bill which had been passed in 1869 for the governance of the northwest had not been very successful, and the Red River settlements and the northwest territories came in as an organized province. It was not until 1876 that the territories were detached for governmental purposes and Manitoba became the province that we know today.

British Columbia Enters.

The next recruit was British Columbia in 1871. This, the biggest of all the provinces and acclaimed the most wealthy in natural resources, has grown with wonderful speed since it cast in its lot with its eastern sisters.

Six years after Confederation Prince Edward Island repented of her refusal to join, and after making certain terms that have been fulfilled as nearly as possible she entered into the Dominion.
Then in 1905 came the last two additions to the group. Alberta and Saskatchewan were invested with autonomous government by the Laurier Government. The prairies of the last west had been filling up with great rapidity and the four old territories under a territorial Government no longer sufficed for their needs.

The history of Canada since Confederation have been an unbroken

SIR WILFRID LAURIER.

of "Grand Old Man," and who has John's beloved Canadian Pacific.

record of expansion and progress that should bring joy to the heart of every Canadian. Sir John A. Macdonald set himself to work as soon as the worries of reorganization were over, to build the only thing that would save Canada from slipping piecemeal into the American Union. He built a transcontinental railway. The day that the first locomotive, the old "Lady Dufferin," steamed into Winnipeg it meant that the west had been saved to be the granary of empire.
Across the plains it continued its way and when at last the rails were laid along the Fraser Canyon into Vancouver the tie was complete that bound together the Canadian sheaf.

An Old Boys' Reunion.

In these days of parents there is one spectacle that would prove a drawing card in this Canada of ours.
It would be a reunion of the old boys —not the boys of twenty or thirty years ago who come back to look at the beech tree where they cut their initials, but the real old boys who died a century or two or even three before the present generation saw the daylight.

There has been times when it has seemed a slow business, this building of a great nation on what Voltaire called a "few acres of snow," and there must have been times when the weary enthusiasts felt like giving up and going home to their own firesides, as did Lord Selkirk. But they would know to-day that of exploitation when merely a work of exploitation when spoiled court favorites came to the new land to make money, but through the whole thing has run the vein of heroism of doing the thing for the sake of doing it well that has given Britain everything she has, including her proudest possession, the over-seas Empire of Canada.

Mr. Joe Porter visited friends in Mr. Kunsenhauer, of this place went to visit friends in Hanover, and while there he slipped and fell, fracturing his thigh. We understand he is in a very critical condition, but hope he will soon recover.

Mr. Robt. Burns, of Mulock, accompanied by his daughter and sister, Mrs. Galloway, visited Mr. and Mrs. John Burns. We are glad to know that Mrs. Burns is quite able to walk without a stick, as she had a serious trouble in her foot a few years ago.

Mr. Tom Hopkins is nursing a sore eye at present. We hope he will soon be able to see straight again.

Cattle King Brunt, of Hanover, passed through here on Friday and made a number of purchases.
A very successful operation was performed on a little child of Mr. and Mrs. John Adlam by Dr.
Gun, and at present the little lad is getting along nicely.

Last Saturday was an excellent day for our picnic, and everybody got busy in the morning to get cream and supplies for the booth.
The day was all that could be desired, and the most successful picnic that was ever held in our section took place in the afternoon.

A large crowd assembled, and the ladies had numerous baskets, chuck full of the very best eatables, and the ice cream was extra well prepared by Miss Kate McKinnon, while the fact that Miss Clark, while the fact that the children in first class shape, was easily shown by the way they acted their part of the program. Rev. Mr. Start occupied the chair, in a very pleasing manner, and made a spicy little speech. Other interesting addresses were given by Messrs. R. J.
Ball, J. Adams, banker, and H. J.
Miller, M.P., of Hanover, and Ye Editor, of Durham. Mr. P.
Ramagay sang a solo, which was lively and enjoyed. The violin music was given by Messrs. Brunt and Brown freely given, and quite untiring.
The recitations and dialogues were extra well given, and the singing by the children was fine, while Miss Annie Brown made the organ correspond. Miss Eva Redford sang a solo very sweetly, and the program was closed by singing God Save The King, after which the ladies passed around the contents of the well-filled baskets, doing justice to all the good things the crowd left to go to the school children's races, which were much enjoyed by all. The prizes were so arranged by the teacher and trustees, that the small children received a small fee as well as credit is due to our teacher, Miss Clark, for the enthusiasm she showed towards the picnic from start to finish.

Miss Eleonore Wright, eldest daughter of Rev. R. W. Wright, has been filling an engagement to sing at Burlington, and leaves this week for Muskoka to attend the Dominion Conference of the Young Women's Christian Association to which she is a delegate from the Ontario Ladies' College.
