BRANDRAM-HENDERSON'S ENGLISH PAINT

"The old man knows good paint, you bet."

And knows just why "ENGLISH" Paint is so good.

The white base is 70% Brandram's B. B. Genuine White Lead and 30% White Zinc.

That's why "ENGLISH" Paint spreads so easily and covers so well.

And he knows it's a mighty comfortable feeling to buy paint that has a guarantee on the can, signed by the manufacturers'.

FRANK LENAHAN & CO., Durham, Ont.

Classic City Chronicles.

Last April, I gave the readers of the Chronicle a brief account of my year's experience in "keeping hens," and proved conclusively that there is money in the business, especially for the farmer. There is, however, another "side-line" that I would engage in, were I a farmer, and it is "keeping bees". Nearly every farmer keeps hens and cows, but very few have one colony of bees, notwithstanding the fact that honey is one of the most wholesome, appetizing and valuable dishes that ever graced the table. The young city lady who joyfully exclaimed, "Oh! I see you keep a 'bee'" when she saw honey on the table, doubtless had a ridiculous conception of what a bee looked like, but she had a vivid recollection of the inimitable sweetness of the nectar which the industrious little insect stored up for food. It is really remarkable how ignorant the great majority of farmers are concerning the vastly important part the bee plays in the economy of nature. They may readily laugh at the city girls who ask to see the cow that gives the butter-milk, or the bee that produces the honey, but how many of the farmers know that without the bee there would be no apples in the orchard, no cucumbers on the vine, no peas in the pod, no pumpkins in the cornfield, no seed on the buckwheat? In short, how many are aware that if every bee were destroyed, our country would be almost, if not entirely ruined? The fertilization of the flowers depends principally on the bees. It is true that other insects, and the wind, contribute considerably towards reproduction, but the hairy little bodies of the bees are the chief pollen distributors of plant life. A writer in the O.A.C. Review confirms what I have just stated. He tells us that in a certain section of Ontario there is an apiary of 100 colonies where seed-alsike is grown. The seed close to the apiary was a splendid yield, while one and a half miles away, it was not worth threshing, showing that the bees had not found it necessary to go that far for nectar, and the fertilization of those blossoms had been neglected." Surely then it is profitable to keep bees from the standpoint of fruit and seed production alone. But bees have a double value, for while they are fertilizing flowers, they are gathering honey, which furnishes one of the most palatable and wholesome foods that ever was eaten. From the apiary referred to, the proprietor gathered 8000 lbs. of honey, and "the farmers within a radius of one and a half miles had hundreds of dollars' worth of alsike seed which those outside did not get." It would pay the farmers to procure dependable literature on bee culture, and then put the information obtained into practice by investing in a colony or two of bees. Then when they found out by experience how to handle them properly, they will be ready for more extensive operations. I was talking recently to an old man (83 years), who has been keeping bees for many years, and he told me that if he were young again he would take up bee-keeping as an occupation. He believes it is one of the most interesting and profitable industries connected with agriculture. It may not be wise, however, to turn one's farm into an apiary, but I am confident that it would pay any farmer to keep say 10 or 15 colonies, after he has learned how to take care of them.

The hot, dry spell we are having is causing some anxiety, but so far, the crops in this district have not suffered any, owing to the heavy clay soil, which sustains the moisture much longer than lighter land. Fall wheat promises to be a bumper crop, while spring cereals and hay are rapidly forging ahead.

An organization known as "The Boy Scouts," has been successfully launched in this city by the Rev. Dr. Salton, pastor of the Central Methodist church. The boys wear an attractive uniform of khaki and cow-boy hats. The object of the Association is to develop keen observation, patience, obedience, muscular strength and physical endurance. Each scout is bound to learn to swim, run and jump. The movement is very popular among the boys, and should be started in every village, town and city.
