An Incident That Ended In Her Leaving the Sky Parlor.

By IZOLA L. FORRESTER.

The model at Vivon's had fainted. It was in the middle of the morning sitting, the very apex of intensity in the lesson. Little Vivon moved lightly and restlessly here and there from one easel to another, his small, black eyes mere high lights of sparkling eagerness under their heavy brows. He smoked his short, thick pipe and glanced from the charcoal studies to the slim white figure on the platform.

The sunlight poured full into the long, bare atelier. Suddenly the model swayed ever so slightly and sank to

Some of the girls gave quick, frightened cries, and Jean Laurier glanced up with a smothered exclamation of angry dismay over his unfinished sketch. From the first easel to the right of the platform the American student, Hal Crane, sprang to the platform and raised her head on his arm. It was such a young head. The loose, warm tinted hair lay softly against his shoulder, and he noticed for the first time how thin the small, piquant face Vivon hopped excitedly the length of the room and waved his small plump hands for order.

"It is nothing," he said. "She is fatigued, it is so warm. Can you carry her, M. Crane?'

Could be carry her? Crane smiled grimly as he raised the slender figure in his arms. Why, his little sister Bess, back in Crawfordsville, Mo., was neavier than this. He followed Vivon from the atelier away from the battery of amused, curious eyes to the artist's private den.

"Ma foi." laughed petite Yvette, her eyes narrowing critically, "that was too, and let le gros Crane waltz me off

Laurier leaned lazily over her shoulder and scrawled a rough caricature on the corner of her paper.

She boxed his ears soundly and reached a greedy little hand after the box of bonbons Elsie Ticot was passing. The model was forgotten. "Lay her there." Vivon nodded to a corner divan in the inner studio heaped high with pillows, sketches and costumes. Crane ruthlessly pushed the latter off with his foot to make room for his burden. He laid her down gently and held to her lips the glass of water Vivon brought. "It is just faintnesss, yes?" asked way that made men obey. "Who is she?" asked Crane when he had managed to get a few drops of wine between the pale lips. "One of Ribaut's models," Vivon answered nervously. The sounds from the atelier were not conducive to peace of mind. Yes, she was a new one. Riholidays. A properly qualified baut had sent her to him yesterday, teacher, second class preferred. and he had engaged her for the poise, the grace, the turn of the head, that line from the tip of the ear to the slope of the shoulder. "Oh, yes; that was nothing! Lots do." Laurier had said the American had reduced cheerful lying to an art. "It's so hot there in the mornings, you know." There was a quiver of hopeless disappointment around the curves of her mouth, and he knew what troubled her. There was a five franc piece in his pocket. He laid it unblushingly on the taboret beside her. "Vivon said that was yours. He

Her eyes brightened with surprise, and he knew his surmise had been right. "I must go home," she said, trying to rise from the cushions. "Wait while I get a carriage." Crave started for the door decidedly. "I'll send one of the girls to help you." She thanked him with a smile that made him whistle as he went down two flights three steps at a time. When he returned he carried her down to

It was not hard to find her "sky parlor," as Crane called it mentally, off the Rue des Coeurs Claires. He called there the next evening, and she met him at the head of the dusty landing with a shy dignity and led the way into her attic apartment as if it had been a Louis Quinze reception room in pink and gold. A young girl, younger even than herself, sat in an easy chair by the window and smiled up at him.

"This is Lucille, my sister," Virginia said simply. Crane's quick eyes noticed the slim pair of crutches leaning beside the chair. He knew why she had posed at Ribaut's and Vivon's, why she had not hidden her poverty and starved in silent pride.

The next time he came he brought flowers for Lucille, and a new, grateful friendliness flashed in the other's blue

It became a regular thing, that walk home from Vivon's to the Rue des Soeurs Claires. She showed him some of her sketches, and Crane promptly took a bunch under his arm and hawked them around the art stores with a devout persistency his own had never known. Before a month had passed she had picked up odd work coloring pen and ink proofs for one of the weeklies, and at last there came a day when she left Vivon's for good, and the future was full of hope.

"And we shall see, la-la-la; we shall see now," laughed Yvette. "He is in earnest, le gros Crane. The wedding bells will go ding-a-ling, and the little white faced Virginia will have roses in her cheeks." "It's all your doing," Virginia told him that night when they parted at her door. "I was worn out and heartsick that day when I fainted, and you cheered me, and-and"- She faltered and held out her hand to him. There was a five franc piece in it. "Please take it back," she said. "Vivon told me, and I think it was just splendid of you." Crane flushed hotly, but he took it. He knew her pride and that to her it was a debt of honor.

"And after today, what?" he asked. "I shall miss the walk home, and you will forget Vivon's and me." She bent her head low over the bunch of pink roses he had given her for Lucille, and something in her silence gave him courage. "Virginia, if you would only give me the right to sweep you and Lucille away from this, the sky parlor and the struggle that never ends! I'm strong and have gained a footing, and you could study then," he rambled on, with boyish helplessness. "I've loved
