COST OF LUXURIES

Fine Clothes and Food Not Necessary
—But Hard to Abandon

It isn't things which we need that cost so dearly as to keep most of us poor, but the things that we don't need and would be better without. In other words, it's the luxuries which at once impoverish and enslave us. For instance, take the much discussed matter of eating. It is literally true that a person in good health can keep the human machine going at full efficiency on the merest fraction of what the average Canadian thinks he must spend for food. A glass of milk, a handful of uncooked and uncracked wheat—wheat just as nature meant it should be eaten—and, for desert, a prune or a pinch of raisins make a meal rich in all the essentials of nutrition at a cost which is negligible. The same rule of simplicity is true of other daily necessities. Clothing, to cover nakedness and serve as bodily protection, can be had for the merest fraction of the sums usually expended upon it. In proof, see how little you spend on your camp clothing and how serviceable and comfortable it is. While for bedding a pile of pine twigs and a blanket make a couch as restful as the downiest contraption that ever graced a king's palace. It has been demonstrated that people can be fed with palatable and sufficient food at an actual cost, right in this era of high prices of six cents a day. They can be, but they won't.

AMBASSADORS' PAY

European Countries Give Big Money to Their Diplomats

In contrast with the position of the United States Ambassador to Great Britain, who has to rent his own house, on a salary of $17,500 a year, is the situation of foreign diplomats in Washington. All of the important embassies in Washington are either owned outright or are rented by the countries represented, ample funds are provided for upkeep, and salaries range from $20,000 to $50,000. England pays her ambassador at Paris, $45,000; at Berlin, $40,000; at St. Petersburg, $39,000; at Rome, $35,000; and at Vienna, $30,000. Germany pays her ambassador at Paris, $30,000; at London, $27,500; at St. Petersburg, $27,500; at Rome, $25,000; and at Vienna, $20,000. The French ambassador at Berlin receives $28,000; at London, $40,000; at Rome $24,000; at St. Petersburg, $40,000; and at Vienna, $35,000. Russia pays her ambassadors at Berlin, London, Paris, and Vienna, $40,000 each. The highest salary paid to any United States ambassador is $17,500 a year.

Foggy Smoky London

English scientists have found that more than half a million tons of sulphurous acid are discharged into London's atmosphere every year, mainly by the combustion of illuminating gas, to the injury of the city's stone buildings.
