Good Advice For All on More Ways Than One

"He is running with his head down. It's a pity," said the man who sat in front of me. We were on one of the swift moving trains that carries city workers to seashore homes in the summer. His remark concerned a handsome, tawny collie that, separated from its master, who was walking on the edge of the high bank of the railroad cut, had chosen to follow the railroad track. Everyone who watched knew the dog's doom. From the opposite direction came a warning whistle. Around the curve came a huge engine, snorting, powerful, inescapable—unless the dog should raise its head, unless his eyes should be the But he did not look up.
