strange thing that whiskey should ever be scarce in Scotland, and Sinclair lamented the days not so very long before when good whiskey was a penny ha-penny a glass, and no limit to the quantity. However, the speaker expressed the opinion that in all probability the prohibitive price was the only prohibition Scotand would see for some time.

Edinboro, the Scotchman will tell you, is the most beautiful city, not only in Scotland, but in the whole world. Princess street, its chief thoroughfare, is lined on one side by fine shops, on the other a great natural park, with a forest or trees, and back of it all, old Edinboro Castle surmounts the gentle hill that rises behind. Not only the place of beauty, but the home of education, Edinboro has given to the world many a noted man in academic life, men who like Carlyle, walked many a weary mile to reach that seat of learning.

From Edinboro the speaker passed on to Glasgow, the Manchester of Scotland, where more than half the manufacturing population of Scotland are to be found. Then down into the Burns country to Kilmarnock, where the first edition of Burns' poems were published and then to Ayr to visit such places of interest to every visitor, as Tam o Shanter's Tap Room, and the Burns monument in the market square.

From here on the speaker took us with the story of Burns' life and works as, the river which flows close to Ayr, the Burns cottage, and close to Ayr, the B the Burns museum, and, farther on, with the master if you wished, but woman superintendent and an assis-Shanter's curiosity overcame his cowardice and he saw the witches dance at midnight hour to the pip

Then to Dundee and Aberdeenshire, the agricultural country Scotland. When one notes, the speaker said, throughout the whole of the Old Land the use that is made of every inch of arable land, little pockets of ground in the midst rock, and then remembers that, with a population of 46 millions they conrol over one-half the commerce of the world, it makes one proud to be a Britisher, and also gives some unlerstanding of how it was possible for the pioneers of such stock to hew out a living in this new land. It is the boast of the Highlands hat in the late war some regiments were five times recruited from one Glen alone, and even in the reconstruction, despite much seeming unrest, all are doing their best to carry a share of the burden.

Mr. Marshall spoke of a trip to the Prince of Wales' stock farm in Cornwall and the marvellous country through which they travelled, with little three- or four- or five-cornered fields pieced together like a crazy quilt. Then back to Melrose just as dusk was falling, to view "Fair Melrose in the pale moonlight"; then on to Abbottsford, the home of Scott, with all its wondrous memories.
