DOUGLAS FAIRBANKS, JR. IN "STEPHEN STEPS OUT"

Popular Son of Noted Siro Makes Debut to Local Movie Fans in Paramount Picture Friday and Saturday of This Week.

"Stephen Steps Out" is the offering at the Veterans' Star Theatre this week, and if advance notices and reviews are any criterion, the local play-house should be filled to the doors for each performance. Douglas Jr. is the son of Douglas Sr., so well known in motion pictures, but possibly better known to Canadians as the husband of Mary Pickford. The story of "Stephen Steps Out" is, in short:

Stephen Harlow, Jr., a fine, high-spirited boy, quick to learn, but with the average distaste for study, is a senior in the Stillwater Prep. school for boys, which was endowed by his father, head of a big packing company.

Dr. Black, president of the school, a toady who aims always to keep in the good graces of Harlow Sr., has seen to it that Stephen has managed to slip through all examinations. When the June examinations arrive, Stephen fails as usual, but all except one of his instructors give him the passing "fifty". Old Dr. Gilman, professor of ancient and modern history, conscientiously marks 'five' on Stephen's paper in Turkish history, lowering his average below the limit required for graduation.

But there is a reaction when Harlow Sr. arrives. He first gives Black a terrific dressing-down and then turns to his son and heir. "Probably your fault—you won't study, eh?" He engages Virgil Smythe, a private tutor, and sends Stephen to Constantinople "to study Turkish history on the spot until you can recite it backwards." The boy had counted on a summer in the Maine woods. Stephen hears of Black's dismissal of Gilman, after his arrival in Turkey. He keeps the cables hot with wires of the outrage to his father. Stephen makes a friend of Harry Stetson, ex-newspaper reporter and press agent. Stetson promises to help Stephen obtain for Dr. Gilman a decoration from the Sultan known as the Star of the Order of the Crescent.

Through the interception of a telegram, Smythe finds himself a prisoner in the hands of a band of conspirators who also hold the Sultan's son a captive. Attempting to communicate with Smythe Stephen is also apprehended and confined to a cell, next to that of Prince Yussuf. Through a clever ruse Stephen, employing a series of football tactics, manages to make his escape, working his way into the Council Chambers of the Sultan where he manages to make himself understood. The Sultan promises him the Grand Cross of the Crescent, for Dr. Gilman.

In America, through Stetson, eight hundred newspapers are printing daily encomiums of Dr. Henry Gilman. Harlow Sr. reads the notices, tears down to Stillwater and furiously orders Black to get Gilman back or quit. Gilman gladly accepts re-instatement. Stephen again flunks his history exam. But meantime Harlow has cornered Stetson and forced from him the story of Stephen's doings in Constantinople. Harlow is delighted, but shows a hard face to Stephen when the boy comes to announce that he has failed again. Harlow points to Dr. Gilman and the decoration gleaming on his worn frock coat. "How did you do it?" asks Harlow. Stephen pretends to be puzzled and fully expects to be sent back to Turkey. But Harlow chuckles. "I'll have to hand it to you!" and he proudly takes Stephen's arm in his own.

view dealing in invectives against those of the opposite view it is a pretty safe guess to say that they have no logical argument to present or else they are irritated by a guilty conscience which they are trying to allay by vigorous protest against imagined curtailment of rights.
