Steamship Conference are highly organized and presumably in a west-bound cargo.

Unlike land transportation, the seas are free to all who would use them. There are no permanent rights of way, there are no franchises. A ship is launched, she is properly registered, her house flag hoisted, and she is ready for business the world over. Be she Norwegian, British, French or what not the seas are free, and the ports of the world are open to her. If a free lance, that is to say a tramp, she is attracted where cargo is plentiful and freights high, but her infrequent calls and her haphazard goings and comings, unless specially chartered, makes her a negligible factor in the great ports of the world. The strength of the Steamship Conference lies in the fact that their ships go where they are wanted, and it remains to be seen how far Peterson and Company can fulfill these conditions.-Toronto Saturday Night.
