The rough-cast structure was a two-storey affair that was erected for a general store as early as 1855, by Rev. J. J. Wilson, a pioneer new Connexion Methodist divine who dabbled in real estate as a sideline to recruit his diminutive fortune was therefore one of the earliest buildings of the town and likewise one of the most pretentious of the ancient structures.

Here Messrs. J. & J. Hunter of Durham established a branch general store with the late E. W. Atwood, whose widow still resides in Walkerton, as manager. It was a sort of Hudson's Bay Trading Post for the early settlers and did a thriving business for a time. However, all things come to an end, even in Walkerton, and this business was succeeded by others that weren't so thriving, two of them bursting up within the memory of the writer and losing a bunch of money in the form of unsettled accounts. This little bit of sadness came back to us as we beheld the old structure in the hands of the wrecking crew last week. May it make way for a more prosperous undertaking, and may the bright lights on the new gas station make the place look like the milky way on a dark night!—Bruce Herald and Times.
