TIME AT THE POLE

(Youth's Companion) Within a few days of each other, Byrd in an airplane, and Amundsen and Ellsworth in a dirigible have flown, at ease, over that spot on the earth's surface which man for centuries regarded as inaccessible and which it took Peary eight months of grinding and exhausting toil to reach by sledge in 1909. We know now all there is to know about the aspect of the sea below it and the depth of the ice around it. Other men may visit it in the future, but the great thrill of the quest is over. The trip will always be an expensive and adventurous undertaking, but it begins to be an old story.

There is not much to see, it appears, at the North Pole; nothing but a limitless field of fairly level ice, unbroken by any conspicuous object whatever. But, monotonous as it is to the eye, it has some characteristics that are far from monotonous. Take the matter of time, for example; there everything is in the most picturesque confusion. Time, as we measure it, is based on the revolution of the earth. An hour is one twenty-fourth of the period in which the earth turns on its axis. For every fifth degree of longitude on the earth's surface there is a difference of one hour of time. When it is noon at Greenwich, it is noon at every point along that same meridian of longitude. It is eleven o'clock along the meridian fifteen degrees to the westward, and seven o'clock everywhere along the meridian of seventy-five degrees, which is that of Washington.

Now, all these meridians converge and finally meet at the two poles, North and South. If it were possible for twenty-four men to set out from points on the forty-fifth degree of latitude, each one hour apart in time, and to travel due north, each keeping closely to the meridian of longitude in which he stood in the beginning, they would all meet at last at the North Pole. There they would stand, side by side; but if they took out their watches and compare them they would indicate twenty-four different times—supposing that they carried watches the dial of which were divided into twenty-four hours instead of twelve. And when they turned to retrace their steps along the meridians on which they had travelled to the pole, each would march in a different direction—each one in a precisely opposite direction to others—but all of them would be "going south."

You can have your choice of time at the pole. It is all hours at once there. If you ever happen to go there in some great airship of the future, you may pull out your watch and say, "It is just ten o'clock."

But it is also eleven o'clock and twelve, and one and two, and so on round the dial. What you really mean is that it is ten o'clock at the place from which you started on your voyage. At the pole watches and clocks are meaningless.

Somewhat Twisted "Things didn't seem to work together in your series of dramatic representations." "They didn't," admitted Mr. Storminton Barnes. "When we played tragedy, the box office receipts were a farce, and when we played farce, they were a tragedy."
