Tannery Burglarized

Burglars effected an entrance to C. A. Sinclair's tannery, Main Street East, some time during Wednesday night, May 18, and helped themselves to about $135 worth of goods. Mr. Sinclair's opinion is that it looks like the work of someone familiar with the layout of the premises.—Sheburne Economist.

Deluge of the Discarded

During the past week there was another deluge of discarded posters on the floor of the post office and in the scrap box, the latter being practically full at noon the day of distribution. The people have got rather fed up with having this class of material filling their post office boxes, and throw it aside with disdain. The postmaster is not to blame for placing these in the boxes as it is part of his duty, the postage being paid on them in bulk. Neither is he accountable for the way the people use them the other side of the wicket. The only solution to the wastage is the use of the newspaper for advertising. In this way the purchasing public is reached and results obtained.—Fergus News-Record.

Grey County Boy Killed

Running along beside a manure spreader, on the farm of his father, nine year-old Orville Vokes, oldest son of Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Vokes, of Derby, south of Kilsyth, slipped and fell under the wheel and was instantly killed. The accident occurred on Tuesday of last week.—Walkerton Telescope.

Recovered After Electrification

Ten fellow employees, working in relays, have apparently saved the life of Harold Hedges by artificial respiration, shocked by 25,000 volts while working atop a hydro pole at Sarnia. Hedges was prevented from falling by his safety belt. Lowered to the ground by a block and tackle he was quickly rushed to the hospital. After examination, a doctor asked for volunteers to carry on the artificial respiration. Ten responded and for eight hours they worked in relays. Late at night normal breathing was restored and the willing helpers ceased their labors. Hedges is resting easily. The electrical charges entered his head when it came in contact with an upper wire on the power lines. The lower lines were "dead". He is 21 and recently arrived from England.—Southampton Beacon.

The Unlucky Number

An English railway company has just abolished the number 13 on all its sleeping cars. This has raised the question in London as to how superstitious the phlegmatic Englishman is. It has been discovered that superstition is quite prevalent. The objection to number 13 attaches to trains, hotel bedrooms, cabins on liners, tube trains, trams, omnibuses, clubs, wedding days, sweepstakes motor licenses, aeroplanes, house numbers and football jerseys. Yet in England, as elsewhere, there are those who are sure that 13 is their lucky number.—Walkerton Telescope.

A Dead Stop

The Ontario Safety League in one of its posters puts the case pointedly: "If you are driving an automobile you need not be killed at a railway crossing unless you want to be. Absolute safety at such places can be secured by absurdly simple means. You are not in the position of a mouse that ventures out of its hole when a cat is waiting for it. The danger that you have to avoid is not a silent and mysterious one, lying in wait for you. Your danger is coming down the track and making an awful noise about it. Unless you are stone deaf and blind there is no excuse for you. Thus the risk is plainly that of the driver who takes a chance." Another poster says—"A dead stop before you reach the crossing will prevent a dead stop at the crossing."—Walkerton Telescope.

MAY 24 AS DECORATION DAY?

A correspondent of the Free Press makes the suggestion that May 24 should be made Decoration Day for Canada. He points out that the last Monday in May is Decoration Day in the United States and that it is a great national holiday, when the graves of departed warriors and statesmen are decorated and when patriotic speeches are made to recall to the rising generation the heroes of the past and the historical epochs of the Republic.

Canada has no Decoration Day. Every city and every province has its own Decoration Day and in many places there is none at all. Our correspondent, also, observes that that it is a great national holiday, largely changed. Today there has arisen a generation who do not remember the days of Queen Victoria, or the remarkable hold she had on the affections of her subjects throughout the Empire.

May 24 is no longer kept as a patriotic holiday. There is no speech-making on that day; it is simply the first summer holiday. It is true that May 23, the day before, is observed as Empire Day in the schools of Ontario, but making May 24 Decoration Day would not necessarily affect the significance of this day; it should rather add to it. In addition, by making May 24 Decoration Day the memory of Queen Victoria would be venerated as much as ever, as our correspondent says, while from a patriotic standpoint May 24 would mean more than

now. The name Victoria Day could and should be still retained.

The suggestion is well worthy of consideration by the powers that be.—London Free Press.

GIVE DAD A TIE

Father Has The Floor

On Sunday, June 19th father claims the attention of the whole family. It is his Day and when you come to think of it, why shouldn't father have a special day set aside in his honor? Dad has done a lot for us and never asked for thanks. He's not asking now, but we are going to show him we appreciate his labors and his sacrifices. So on Sunday, June 19th give him a new tie and he will appreciate the spirit that prompts the gift and he will be immensely proud of his family's thoughtfulness.

Canning Drying and Storing Vegetables

Much of the actual value of home garden lies in the fact we are able to can, dry and store vegetables for winter use, and prolong the period when we are allowed to enjoy these. The good garden, and of this kind we are talking, can supply something for practically every day of the year. This is made possible through canning and drying. Canned and stored roots will keep through winter and well into spring.

First we will consider the canning. Our grandfathers knew something about the methods but it has remained the present generation to perfect the idea of preserving food by the cold-pack method. The man who has a garden should be able to can his own produce for free distribution, learn how to can by this method. Briefly, it consists of packing fresh vegetables in the cans, cooking or processing them various periods of time. It is practical to mention here the required for the method is which may be obtained from the Government and is all about that. It may be that green peas, beans, both and shell varieties, sweet corn, the root crops, the vegetables for boiling greens, and in fact practically everything grown in complete garden, can be preserved by this method. There are many kinds of pickles and preserves which may be made from the garden. For recipe in this kind, look in the home farm papers during the summer and fall. I know of farm wife home gardeners who have dozens of cans of delicious and preserved vegetables on cellar shelves every fall. Such a collection detracts from cost of high living very materially.

For the best quality of goods, all products should be stored at exactly the right stage of growth and should be frozen in the garden. It is not generally known that sweet corn, after being gathered, which attracts a good deal from its value. When you are compelled buy this product in the market naturally you will not be able to get it before this change of place. When you get it this year, get the best from the stalk and not the once. Fresh products of all are better than those that have been off the vines for some time. The usual method of canning vegetables for home use is by the use of glass jars. Tin cans are used if preferred.

The older people know how to dry vegetables in ways that cause them to keep for long periods. Considerable experience in drying has been done, and it is not a method which the average home gardener will care to undertake. However, it may be kept by this method for a few months, immediately following the season of growth. If kept longer the product acquires a taste, not palatable to average man and woman. It may be done in the sun, or artificial heat. It is not difficult to construct a drying rack to be set upon, or hung above the range, small quantities of produce may be dried in this way. Kind of vegetable products to be dried, but sweet corn and root crops are two that should be especially considered. Before drying the corn from the cob should be processed in hot water from three to five minutes, set the milk. In vegetables minutes of processing is sufficient to help the dried product in retaining its color. Carrots, beets, endives and vegetables may be dried for some time. They should be sliced or strapped into thin pieces to assist in drying. After a heat to a high temperature, as they will stand without a long, for the purpose of destroying insect eggs which may have laid by living creatures. Starched products in waxed paper or in tin and glass jars are reasonably tight. Dried vegetables are particularly useful for soups and stews. Celery stalks and parsley may be dried for use.

A cool cellar, such as is under many farm houses and will be found useful for storing root crops. In order to keep in the best possible condition should be packed in dry or semi-dry sand. This prevents from softening. Firm products are desirable. Another way in which roots may be preserved is by storing them in a trench in the side of a hill. A covering of straw is then placed over the trench and the whole is filled with straw and the holes filled with straw. Where large quantities of produce are raised and kept for feeding or winter sale, they are stored in a trench, and supplied from one end when needed. The idea is to keep the produce near the freezing point temperature but not let them freeze.

Squashes and pumpkins kept in a roots will keep the temperature remains about fifty degrees Fahrenheit heated house is desirable and an upstairs room serves
