CARE OF THE BREEDING FLOCK

(Experimental Farms Note.)
The quantity and quality of the produce which the sheep-breeder will have to market the following year are largely determined by the care which the flock received during the fall months, September to November, and the spring months from March until June. While most breeders realize the influence which proper care at lambing time will have on the number of good lambs raised, few consider the breeding season and the period just preceding it as worthy of any special attention; and yet the old slogan of livestock breeders, "Breed, Feed and Weed", can be applied at this time to as good or better advantage than at any other period in the year. At this time the breeder should select the sire of his next year's crop of lambs. Nothing but a good purebred should be used; one that has been inspected and passed as a good representative of the breed. Strict selection of the ewes should also be practised, and all those of poor mutton and wool type should be culled; also those that have shown themselves poor breeders. Any ewe which is a shy or non-breeder is a distinct loss to the owner and should not be retained in the flock.
At the Experimental Farm, Nappan, Nova Scotia, figures have been collected on the average cost of keeping a ewe for a year, also on the profits which may be expected when the flock is carefully selected and the average culling practise. The average feed cost of a ewe, over a period of six years, is $8.72. The profit over feed cost is $8.46. A non-breeding ewe returns only her wool to pay for her keep. The average value of this is $2.40, so the loss to her owner is $14.78 per year. The ewe which is a poor milkier and raises only a small lamb, returns an average $7.20, which is not enough to pay for her feed.
All lambs should have been weaned about the last of August. The ewes are flushed for three weeks or more in September on clover aftermath or rape supplemented with a small amount of grain, such as oats and bran. Ewes which are in good condition and gaining in flesh at breeding time, will drop and raise a larger percentage of lambs than the ewes in poor condition. At the Nappan Farm twenty ewes which were not flushed and raised twenty-three four lambs and dropped twenty-two on clover aftermath dropped forty lambs and raised thirty-three. Allow the ewes to remain on the clover or rape for only a few hours a day when first put on this feed or bloating will result. After breeding, the ewes may be wintered on good clover hay and turnips with little or no grain until shortly before lambing time.

Not What She Meant
"Tact", said the lecturer, "is essential to good entertaining. I once dined at a house where the hostess had no tact. Opposite me was a modest quiet man.
"Suddenly he turned red as a lobster on hearing his hostess say to her husband, 'How inattentive you are, Charlie.' You must look after Mr. Brown better. He's helping himself to everything."

BASIC SLAGS: THEIR NATURE AND USE

(Experimental Farms Note.)
Basic slag, a by-product in the manufacture of steel, is of value as a fertilizer because of its phosphoric acid content. Its phosphoric acid is not immediately soluble and therefore it is a somewhat slow-acting fertilizer; its effect may be expected to extend throughout an average crop rotation.
While not so widely used or so popular generally as super-phosphate—a readily soluble form of phosphoric acid—basic slag has been found to be an effective and profitable phosphoric fertilizer in many parts of the Dominion. It has proved of special value in the improvement of heavy clay loams fairly well supplied with humus as from dressings of manure. As a rule, muck soils and soils deficient in lime, both of which types are apt to be acid, respond to applications of basic slag, the response not being due in part to the alkaline character of this fertilizer from the presence of a certain percentage of free lime.
In England and Scotland, carefully conducted experiments have shown that basic slag gives good results when applied to grass lands, bringing in the finer grasses and encouraging the growth of clover and in this way increasing the nutritive value of the herbage of old pastures. In Eastern Canada—chiefly in the Maritime provinces and on the Pacific coast, experiments conducted on the Dominion Experimental Farms have shown that basic slag is valuable for clover and timothy hay, turnips, mangels and corn—crops for the most part with a long season of growth.
There are several types of slag on the Canadian market. These will vary as to total phosphoric acid content and availability. The better grades will contain from 16 to 18 per cent total phosphoric acid and have a fineness of 80 or over.
