STORAGE OF APPLES

(Experimental Farms Note.) It is difficult for some people to realize that an apple is a living thing in which certain natural changes continue after harvest.

The maturity of fruit has a considerable bearing on both quality and storage life. As an example of this last statement two pickings of Gravensteins were made in 1926. Trees in fairly uniform condition were selected. The fruit from one lot of trees was picked and a representative sample stored. Ten days later the fruit from the other trees was picked and a representative sample stored along with the first picking.

The early picked fruit was not so highly colored as the second lot and the ground color was still a pronounced greenish yellow. The second lot was highly colored with a good yellow ground and the fruit averaged three pounds harder than the first picked fruit. After two months' storage the early picked fruit was still marketable but lacked the desert quality, color and hardness of the fruit from the second picking.

Apples showing considerable scab or blemish from disease should not be kept in storage any longer than necessary as such fruit will invariably rot and will quicker than sound specimens. Good ventilation that will drop the temperature of the storage room as quickly as possible in the autumn is essential for the storing of the autumn varieties. Warm temperatures hasten the changes that ripen and will apples whereas low temperatures prolong the storage life by slowing up the natural ripening processes.
