Corry preached a sermon suitable for the young people, taking for his text Mark 6: 33: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness and all these things shall be added unto you." The preacher dealt with the points in a simple way, taking them (1) Geography; (2) Arithmetic (3)

Grammar, and showing the children that the Kingdom of God was within you. Luke 17 chapter. In the evening a very able sermon was delivered from John 12: 21: "Sir, we would see Jesus." The preacher very ably handled his theme making his climax the need of "seeing" Jesus, hearing about Him, reading about Him was not sufficient. The world today wants to "see" Jesus through individuals and through His church.

LAST RELIC OF OLD STAGE COACH GONE

Bolt-in-Tun Inn Torn From Fleet Street, Old London.—Dated Back Five Centuries.—Was Famous in Dickens' Time as Coaching Inn.

The last relic of the last inn in London, England, from which a stage-coach struggled in hopeless competition with the railway has just disappeared from Fleet street. For five centuries the Bolt-in-Tun Inn stood on the south side of the street and was a landmark way to become the highway of printers' ink. The friars owned the inn, in fact.

A century ago as many as 26 stage-coaches started daily from the Bolt-in-Tun, their horns blowing and the iron-shod feet of the horses clattering over the cobbles of Fleet street. Charles Dickens knew the inn well, in the days when its coaching traffic, outlasting its usefulness, was struggling gallantly against the new-fangled railway.

There is in existence an advertisement of stage-coaches running from Bolt-in-Tun to Bath in Bristol and the name of the proprietors of the coaches is given as "Moses Pickwick & Co." It is not a wild flight of imagination, therefore, to hazard where Dickens secured the name of perhaps the most illustrious of his creations, Moses Pickwick was a celebrated coach proprietor. His headquarters were at Bath, where he had risen from post-boy to be landlord of the famous White Hart Inn.

For many years now the remains of the Bolt-in-Tun have been a parcel office for one of the great railways, but you could still see in the passage alongside the heavy timbers against which the axles of the stage-coaches used to grind as they went in and out Fleet street. Now the parcels office has gone, and the last relic of the Bolt-in-Tun has fallen into the hands of the housebreakers, and only a gap in the houses remains where once stood a famous coaching inn.
