The student said something about testing the theory then and there. Houdini was absorbed in his letter and gave an absent-minded reply which the boy took for an assent. Whereupon Houdini was astonished to receive several hard punches on the abdomen. At the fourth blow he stopped the young man by a gesture just as the other two students had to locate the trouble. jumped up in protest. Acute peritonitis set in, and after making a gallant fight for life, Houdini died in a hospetal. There was something particularly poignant about the death of this remarkable man just in his prime, and when he was emerging from his role of mere entertainer to throw all his energies into the task of unmasking the heartless mediums who make a living out of the credulity of those who long for communication with the dead. more grotesque ending could hardly have been imagined. It was as though he had been murdered in the course of a practical joke. Unnoticed for Years Houdini, whose real name was Elrich Weiss, was a German Jew, born in Wisconsin of parents whose poverty made it necessary for the boy to earn his own living when he was eleven years old. He had already learned his first trick which was to hang head downward from a limb and pick up needles with his eye-lids. He had also picked up some useful knowledge about locks by working for a locksmith. It was inevitable that he should gravitate toward a side show, and this he did after a brief experience as messenger boy and tie-cutter. For some years ne worked with these travelling shows and dime museums, picking up tricks that he was later to expand into works of art, training his body until it would have done credit to any professional athlete in the country, and throwing until the hour of his death was almost himself with the most astonishing energy into whatever task was set him. But he seemed to attract no special attention, though he amazed rustics and their more sophisticated town cousins by his handcuff tricks. The turn of his career came in 1900 when he and his wife whom he had married when he was eighteen ventured all their savings in passages to England Made in Scotland Yard On arrival there he found the outlook inauspicious. The London public was rather sour on American entertainers at the moment because of the exposure of trickery on the part of the Bullet Proof Man and the Georgia Magnet. The booking agents were not encouraging, but eventually Houdini got an audience with the manager of the Alhambra, convinced him that he could do some good tricks and prevailed upon the manager to introduce him at Scotland Yard. The officers there were incredulous about his claims to get rid of their handcuffs. and he insisted on a trial. The Superintendent caused Houdini to encircle a pillar with his arms and then snapped a pair of handcuffs upon his wrists. "I'm going to leave you here and come back in a couple of hours,' he said, moving towards the door. "Wait" exclaimed the prisoner, "I'll go with you. Here's the way the Yankees open handcuffs," and he stepped from behind the pillar as the gyves fell on the floor. After this, of course, there was no question about an
