THE SCOT DEFENDED

To say that the Scot has no sense of humor is a libel. All these stories about Scotsmen are written by Scotsmen and sold for money to the newspapers to amuse their English readers. Apart from which only a nation with a keen sense of the ridiculous could keep up the poise the Scots have adopted for centuries without giving tnemselves away.

Nor do I believe that the Scot really prefers the bagpipes to any other form of musical instrument; but you can't make a grand piano out of the internal workings of a sheep.

Then, take the haggis. Contrary to the usual impression, the haggis is not shot on the wing, nor is it caught in a trap. You simply take the various parts of a sheep and pack them into another part of the sneep with suet, onions, salt and pepper and oatmeal. Then you tie a string around the monster's neck and boil it. After which you muzzle it and lead it to the table.

No Englishman bred on roast beef could face it, nor could a Welshman accustomed to a rabbit made from cheese. But the Scot does, and why? Well, he knows that gluttory is an expensive vice, and not even a Scot asks for a second helping of a fearful dish like a haggis.

The kilt again, is a feminine garment, and the Scotsman knows it. The inhabitants of that country wear it when at home, to tone down their natural ferocity; otherwise they would tear each other to pieces. Scotsmen have figured all through

BLOODROOT by Bliss Carman

When April winds arrive And the soft rains are here Some morning by the roadsid These fairy folk appear. We never see their coming However sharp our eyes, Each year as if by magic They take us by surprise.

Along the ragged woodside And by the green spring-run, Their small white heads are And twinkling in the sun They crowd across the meado In innocence and mirth. As if there were no sorrow In all this wondrous earth.

So frail, so unregarded And yet about them clings A sorcery of welcome,-The joy of common things. Perhaps their trail of beauty Across the pasture sod In jubiliant procession Is where an angel trod.
