To Avert War Between English Speaking Nations

What is Making for War with England? is the somewhat arresting title which The Nation of New York chose for an essay competition. It has been won by Charles E. Payne, professor of history at Grinnell college, Iowa, who sets forth not only what he understands as the underlying causes of the friction between the two countries but what he believes to be a cure for them.

Impartially Professor Payne goes over the history of the two nations seeing faults on both sides, but seeing also a fundamental good humor and mutual respect which for more than a hundred years have kept the peace. Before the beginning of the world war the relations between Britain and the United States were happier than they have been before or since, with the exception, perhaps, of the war years themselves, although the German and Irish elements in the United States were then more bitter against Britain than ever before.

But soon after the Spanish-American war certain rivalries had sprung out of American expansion which had in them the seeds of further friction, hidden though they were from the public view.

War Brought Estrangement But the world war created the new situation. It weakened Great Britain's economic position, almost eliminated her rival, Germany, and left the United States the strongest economic power in the world.

In July, 1919, Colonel House reported to President Wilson that he sensed an antagonism to the United States almost as soon as he arrived in England. He thought that the relations between the two countries were beginning to assume the same character as those of England and Germany before the war, and he said, "By her industry and organization Germany was forging ahead as the first power in the world, but she lost everything by her arrogance and lack of statesmanship. Will it be Great Britain or the United States who will next commit the colossal blunder?" There have been new causes of friction created since then, but we do not need to dwell on them. It is sufficient to say that the relations between the two nations are not now as cordial as we could wish, and it is pathetically true that neither the statesmen of either country nor the people themselves have done anything consciously to promote the estrangement. Both peoples want peace, and it is encouraging to reflect that Bryce said "Peace can always be kept, whatever the controversy, between peoples that wish to keep it."

Three Paths to Peace How then is this peace to be secured? Prof. Payne says that practical steps can be taken along three lines: (1) the education of the people as to the issues involved and the forces creating them; (2) the establishment of a machinery for the peaceful settlement of differences; (3) the solution of the freedom of the seas issue. While the press is by far the most important factor in the matter of education he does not expect any great accomplishment from it when the whims and prejudices of correspondents and the desire of publishers for large profits control the foreign policy of newspapers. But he has great hope in the reading public and finds evidence that it is beginning to resent the kind of foreign news service which it has thus far received. Such agencies as the Foreign Policy Association, the World Peace foundation and the Williams-Town Institute of politics are doing admirable educational work, and they are well supported by the better type of weekly journal on both sides of the Atlantic. College professors and educators by improving the quality of text books have contributed greatly to public enlightenment.

Join the World Court Along the second line he says that the first feasible constructive step will be for the United States to join the World Court and give it hearty support. It is unlikely, he admits, that American opinion will go as far as to accept the compulsory jurisdiction of the court, but on the other hand public opinion will approve an agreement with Great Britain to arbitrate all questions that cannot be settled by diplomacy or judicial methods—even questions of vital interest and national honor. As Prof. Payne says, "Our experience of over a century in settling disputes with Great Britain would entirely justify such a step. These two measures will establish a machinery for settling all difficulties and obviate any necessity of ever resorting to war as an instrument of national policy."

He says an arbitration treaty will be certain of approval by both peoples if the vexed question of freedom of the seas can first be disposed of.

Freedom of the Seas. This question he regards as by far the most dangerous in Anglo-American relations. The immemorial policies of the two nations clash here. Mr. Wickham Steed, the distinguished English editor, has proposed that Britain shall declare that she will recognize "absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas outside territorial waters except as seas may be closed in whole or in part by international covenants."

This would probably be agreeable to England if the United States would be willing to recognize any blockade established by unanimous vote of the League of Nations. There would be objection in the United States to surrendering in advance this right of judgment to the League, but if Britain is to surrender her immemorial policy of blockade, the United States may naturally be expected to surrender something, too, especially if she is asked to do so by practically all the civilized nations in the world. Professor Payne's essay is an admirable one, and we trust some peace-loving American millionaire will take steps to see that it has a great circulation both in the United States and in England.

THE VACATION DELUSION Another popular theory has been expounded as a delusion. A French writer vehemently refutes the common supposition that the way to rest is to do something else, to spend a day or a week doing anything that one does not do the rest of the year. This, he says, is only "getting tired another way."

Instead of a theatre or dance after a day of toil, this investigator into the causes and remedies for fatigue recommends repose, sleep, solitude, quiet and inertia. The rest cure he advocates for the tired business man is not golf, motoring, a sea voyage or two weeks at a shore resort. For such, if they really desire rest and recuperation and not merely a vacation, he prescribes a retreat far from the crowd, devoid of activity, the society of others and other disturbing influences.

Of course he is right. And the truth of the matter is that his theory has always been put to practical use. People who go away to rest do not include themselves into thinking they obtain that needed reconstruction of mind and body by participating in sports and mingling with the mob. They seek out some quiet nook and strive with as little effort as possible to see, hear, speak and do as little as possible.

No time is more propitious than the present for removing some misunderstanding of that great American institution, the vacation. Though it destroys the institution itself, the proposition is here issued that the vacation is no longer used as a rest cure and is not necessary as such to the average worker. If there was ever a time when people went on vacations to rest after their labors, they now return from their vacations to rest after their labors.—Midland Argus.
