PRESERVE YOUR RESOURCES

The person who spends the money which he earns in his own town outside his community is helping to exhaust his own resources, in the same manner in which a man who indulges in dissipation exhausts his physical resources by expending his energy faster than the body builds it up.

When a dozen residents or more do their buying outside Durham, they reduce the economic strength of the community to a noticeable extent, and when a hundred or more residents do so, the situation becomes alarming, and the ultimate collapse of the community is inevitable. Its merchants will be forced to retire from business through the losses they incur, public institutions will fall into disrepair through lack of care, and soon the population will begin to fall off, as people move to a more prosperous community. The ultimate end will be ruin for the community and its residents.

Guard against this condition in Durham. The failure of one merchant means little, but the success of the majority of the merchants spells progress for the community and its residents. The merchant is the backbone of the community. Individually, perhaps there are a few who are not boosters of Durham but collectively they are the men upon whom you should depend and give your support. Be individual bankers. Build up your resources through community buying.

THE VISITING CARD

The visiting card of today has a very long pedigree, and dates back to the times of the ancient Egyptians.
It was not actually a card then, of course, says a Tid-Bits article, but took the form of a glazed ware tablet, and was offered when visits were being made, in much the same way as cards are in England today.

Not much is known about this Egyptian custom, however, and the visiting card is really lost in antiquity until it became a vogue in China during the seventeenth century.

Chinese cards were then, and always have been, must larger than those in general use in England, and more often than not they were highly colored; generally red. In this land of the East cards have always played an interesting part, particularly in marriage arrangements.

A Chinese, desirous of marrying, acquaints his parents with the fact, and they, in turn, hand the matter over to a professional matchmaker. This man selects a fitting bride from a list he has always handy, and then calls on the parents of the prospective bride and offers her a young man's card. On this is inscribed one or two particulars, besides the name, including details of the man's birth and his ancestral home.
If the suitor is approved the bride's card is sent to him in return, and ultimately, if the oracles prophesy good, the marriage takes place.

From the East the custom spread indirectly, if not directly, into Germany, and from there it found its way into France, and finally in the latter part of the eighteenth century it began to establish itself in England.
The cards of our near ancestors, however, were nothing like those in use today. Now we insist on simplicity, but then the cards were nothing if they were not elaborate, and for several years famous artists and designers found a ready practice in making new, and often grotesque, designs for their wealthy patrons.

One practice was that of having a pastoral scene painted on the card with the name hidden discreetly among bowers or trees and sometimes birds.
At another time cards were used depicting happenings in the lives of their owners, and yet another fashion was that of having drawings of some popular hero, military or otherwise. Cards used by women were even more elaborate than those of the menfolk, and besides the full name and title they often bore the name and title which the woman possessed before her marriage.

But the honor of making the quaintest known visiting card—if card it may be called—must surely belong to the Dutch painter, Frank Flores. He journeyed several miles once to see his friend, Aartgen, and finding, when he got there, that the friend was out, he is supposed to have drawn a figure of St. Luke on one of the walls. Returning later, Aartgen declared that no one but Flores could have been responsible for such a drawing, and accordingly he immediately set out to repay the visit.
