cropping plants to which it is not congenial. The latter has to do with seed treatment and soil sterilization. Protection is a method of plant disease prevention whereby a barrier is raised between the susceptible host plant and the disease producing organisms. In this we include spraying, as well as the control of insects which act as transmitting and inoculating agents. Disease resistance is an exceedingly important phase of plant disease prevention and offers two ways of approach—selection and plant breeding. The notable contributions of the Dominion Rust Research Laboratory at Winnipeg as applied to control of wheat rust encourages the belief that all of our destructive plant diseases will be prevented through the agency of disease resistance. We can understand our own success but we can neither understand nor stand another's.

PREVENTION OF PLANT DISEASES (Experimental Farms Note.) Each year plant diseases in Canada increase in importance and the population affected becomes greater. This condition is influenced by a combination of factors such as international communication through the agencies of transportation and travel, the general westward trend of civilization together with increased crop production. Generally speaking, recommendations for the prevention of plant diseases are based upon our knowledge of factors responsible for their occurrence. Naturally, the remedy for a disease is to remove the cause. There may be instances where environment is responsible, and it is necessary to modify the environment accordingly. If caused by a parasitic organism, the organism must be destroyed or the plant protected against its attack. Control of plant diseases is measured by the extent to which injurious effects are reduced; and to the practical man control is arrived at only when it is accomplished profitably. However, successful control of plant diseases may be obtained by means not ordinarily appreciated. There are, indeed, four fundamental methods: (1) elimination by inspection and quarantine of plants harboring the disease; (2) eradication of the disease by the destruction of the diseased plants, etc.; (3) protection by the usual spraying and dusting; (4) selection and hybridization of disease resistant strains. The ideal situation will exist when each country will adopt measures rendering it absolutely compulsory to export only such agricultural plants and seeds as are free from serious diseases. The possibilities for such an enterprise as well illustrated by the seed potato inspection service operated by the Federal Division of Botany, Central Experimental Farm, Ottawa. Such inspection involves the examination of suspected plants for the presence of diseases, while quarantine has to do with the investigation of dangerous pathogenic organisms together with the enforcement of laws prohibiting the importation of plants. Eradication of the disease producing organism is a principle which involves chiefly isolation, and destruction. The former aims to starve the organism by
