HISTORY OF PLOUGHS SHOWS VAST IMPROVEMENT

To say that ploughing has not improved in recent years would be a serious charge to make against the skill of the ploughman of today; for the provement over the equipment our fathers and grandfathers had to work with. It is less than two hundred years since the first plough was made with a cast-iron mould-board. Through all history there is no record of anything but wooden ploughs up to the year 1763 when James Small commenced the manufacture of the cast-iron mouldboard plough, long to be called "Small's plough."

The only plough up to this time that had shown any great improvement over the clumsy wooden implements that Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Manary of To- had rudely served British farmers and, indeed, farmers of all countries from time immemorial was that known as the Rotherham, a product of Dutch invention. This plough patented in 1730 was constructed mainly of wood but had draught iron, share, and coulter made of iron and an additional plate on the mould-board.

Closely following on Small's plough past week with Mr. and Mrs. Henry came the Scottish plough with beam and handles of iron. The Wilkies and cident last week. He was removed to names in the history of the plough. A celebrated English plough was Brand's. Mr. Maxwell Tyndall has gone back Robert Ransome of Ipswich substitutable parts followed. All these improvements came between 1730 and 1800 or thereabouts.

The iron plough did not come into plough was of wood with iron sheathings or protective strops. When Charles Newbold, of New Jersey patented an iron plough in 1807, the farmers of that time ridiculed the idea; some declared that the iron poisoned the soil. Others that it made weeds flourish. Newbold's efforts to introduce this plough failed. John Lane in America made the first steel mould-board in 1833. John Deere and James Oliver improved the texture of the steel, eliminating the small holes in the metal left in casting, and toughened the plough by a method of annealng. John Lane, the son, brought in the soft iron core.
