MONEY MARKET

SOME TRIFLES THAT SCARE MILLIONAIRES.

The Many Simple Ways in Which Panics are Started .- Enormous Losses.

The King, or rather Prince of Wales, was out shooting a few years ago, and while firing into the eye of the wind at driven birds, a grain or two of burnt powder was blown

BACK INTO HIS EYES, as often happens when shooting on a windy day. This news was wired up to Lendon in the middle of the afternoon, and caught the money market in an idle and irritable moment. The report was exaggerated, and it sounded as though the Prince was likely to lose his eyesight. Now, It was the time of the commercial treaty with Cermany, which was due to receive the signatures of the Sovereign and the Heir Apparent next day, a formality which didn't make any great difference to the power of the treaty, but was necessary to wind things up. The treaty had been settled in every other way, and the markets and Stock Exchanges of both countries had counted on it, and were waiting for the

One of the quickest and most thorough panics on the list was caused because a small boy once threw a ball of paper at him, in a crowd, while he was driving to Potsdam. Why this appalling incident should cause a slump in British securities seems a poser, but within a minute of the arrival of the news in London, elderly financiers, with millions at their backs, were scuttering about like rabbits in a copse, and shouted breathlessly that they would sell this and that as cheaply as you pleased. This was the famous "Basket" slump, and one of the most pointless panics on record, for

THE SCOUT IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Experience of Major Burnham, the American Scout.

At Zand River Major F. R. Burnham, the American scout, spent an afternoon inside a Kaffir hut, while en a bench outside were ranged a number of Boer officers watching the movements of the British in the distance. The scout, with his eye at a hole in the thin mud plaster wall, an inch from the head of the nearest Boer, was likewise watching the proceedings. There was only one room in the hut, and when some of the Boers decided to come and sit inside the scout had to jump for a pile of skins in one corner and lie motionless underneath one of them for two hours, while one of the Boers sat so close that he could have touched Burnham without rising from his
