HAMLIN GARLAND

Ann followed her into a minute bedroom which opened off the dining room. The old woman began to clatter. "Put off your things here. My, but them's fine furs! Did ye drive up from the Springs? Are you going on to the camp?"

"Yes." "Waal, you'll find it lively up there! As near as I can learn they mean biz!" she whispered. "Some o' Jack Munro's men are in there now eatin'. They keep a mighty sharp watch on who comes in these days. Soon's you're ready I'll put you and your man down at my end of the table and I'll look after ye."

Ann laid aside her furs, but retained her hat, and as she re-entered the room made a dazzling appeal to those rough fellows, who eyed her with sly side glances.

replied, bending to her plate. "They can't refuse to let us pass."

The talk at the table was not illuminating. Each man apparently strove to fill his paunch before his fellow. Only one of them seemed to study Ann and her companion with candid interest. This was a small man with a chin beard and an eye as keen as that of a blue jay. As the other men filled up and left the table he came down and carelessly took a seat near Braide. "I reckon I've seen you before," he began pleasantly.

"I shouldn't wonder. I'm Dr. Braide of Valley Springs."

"Where you aimin' to go now, if it's a fair question?"

"To Skytown." "Goin' to treat somebody?" asked the old woman, who was hovering near.

Ann-interposed. "Yes, he is going up to treat my brother Louis, who is lying ill at Mr. Raymond's cabin."

a rod or two ahead of you-to show you the road." "If so be it you folks have any influence with Rob Raymond, preach him into joining the movement. It'll be a mighty sight safer for him and a big help to the miners." said: "We're in the enemy's country. He was plainly warning us, and his going along is in the nature of an armed guard." "His escort may be of use to us," reasked of the old woman, who fairly girl," he said tenderly.

His fairly level ground the road entered eyes were closed, and, at the moment, another canyon and crawled upward he appeared to be dying. She caught along a prodigious wall, which beat back the clashing roar of a small but very swift stream of water.

It must have been about 5 o'clock when they rounded the great base of the Black Cone at the head of the canyon and looked away across the big camp and far out upon the valley to the west.

Adams, their guide, was a considerable distance in advance when a couple of horsemen encountered them. After a moment's conference one turned back, and the other came on swiftly.

Weak Kidneys, surely point to weak kidney Nerves. The Kidneys, like the Heart, and the Stomach, find their weakness, not in the organ itself, but in the nerves that control and guide and strengthen them. Ann's heart glowed with the hope that it might be Raymond with a message from the sick one, but it proved to be Munro. He came up swiftly and, setting his horse upon his haunches, leaped cavalierly to the ground.

"Good evening, lady," he called as he approached the wagon. "Have you journeyed far?"

"How is Louis?" asked Ann quickly, with instant revolt of his assurance. He felt the impersonal rebuke of her manner and replied simply: "He is better this afternoon, so I hear. I have not had time to call. It is a pleasure to see you again." He fixed his eyes on her companion. "I don't think I know you," he said, with a challenging inflection in his voice.

"I am Dr. Braide of Valley Springs." Ann explained, "Dr. Braide comes to attend my brother."

Braide, already seated, rose to meet Munro's face lost its reckless smile, "We have reached an outpost of and he looked worn and pale. "Doc-

"We must hurry on," interrupted "I am quite ready to meet them," she Ann, warmly impatient of Munro's glances.

Braide chirped to his horses and Munro swung to his seat and followed after. At the foot of the hill he called: "Keep that winding road. It will bring you to the top near Kelly's. I'll meet you there."

The peak was more than quiet-it was shent. It was as if a palsy had fallen upon every ablebodied workman, causing a swift devouring decay to set

"What a change!" exclaimed Braide. "I was here just before this trouble began and these hills teemed with men"-"There is one smoking chimney. It must be the Raymond & Kelly mine."

Ann pointed away up the hill. "How do they keep going?" "The strikers fear them, and, besides, Munro and Raymond are old acquaintances. I think he protects them." Raymond was standing at the Kellys' door as they drove up, his face somber, The stranger glowed again. "Didn't his eyes clouded. He could not speak, so deeply was he moved, but with a way, did ye?" Here he winked at nod at Braide and without a word threw back the robes and reached a The doctor smiled. "Not a thing. glad to see you, doctor. He needs you." Everything whirled before Ann. "If he should die-oh, if he should die! As he rose to go the stranger said: It's all my fault!" she wailed. "It's all my fault!" and her numb limbs refused to move.

"Don't say that," he urged. "I've gone over it a thousand times. I don't see that any one is to blame. I know After the miner left the room Braide | you are not. Come, we must go to him." In that instant something seemed to pass between them-some invisible, intangible bond was established. Ann put out her hand, and he took it gently plied Ann. "Who was that man?" she between his palms. "Be brave, dear She suddenly roused herself and hur-

Trust him to me." Raymond turned comforter. "The doctor is right. His case is not decided yet. You must remember how strong and well he has been. He's not the pale slip he was when he came here. Please go over to the house and let Nora make some tea for you," he pleaded, and at last she yielded and, with a final look at the sick boy, went out with Mrs. Kelly.
