Lack of friendship on the part of some congregations is a detriment to the prosperity of the church, and the church whose members are most ready to extend a warm hand of welcome is Durham, Corner of Durham and Elgin the one most likely to gather in the strangers. To speak to a stranger when he enters or leaves a church is a very small act and could easily be performed by any one professing to be a Christian, but even the small act of shaking hands with a stranger or bidding him welcome is often a matter of neglect, and the stranger who feels unworthy of being noticed often imagines he has struck an iceburg and isn't apt to go back again. If a stranger is looked on with coldness and suspicion as if he showed an inclination to steal the communion service he isn't likely to feel comfortable in such a congregation, and the chances are that he will not trouble them very often. At best a stranger feels strange enough in a strange place, but he doesn't liked to be looked upon with suspicion or regarded as an outcast. It isn't any wonder some churches don't grow either in grace or membership,

It's easy to be critical. We have known some of the most illiterate chumps you could find in a day's walk who were never done criticising. The preachers didn't preach right, the teachers didn't teach right and the editors didn't write right. Preachers, teachers and editors are liable to make mistakes. None of them are paragons of perfection, and only the foolish ones lay claim to such presumption. Honest criticism is good at any time, but the man who poses as a critic should get from under cover and fight like a man. We had a copy of last week's Chronicle returned through the mail Eight words were marked as errors on the front page; one was purely typographical, one we admit was a real error of syntax, but the other six we are prepared to justify as fairly good English. The learned critic tore his name off the paper so as to conceal his identity and, shall we say, to reveal his cowardice. There was nothing in the marginal comments that couldn't be said by an honest man with a desire Spectator explains to Mr. Hamilton, Wire, Wire Fencing, Stoves, Iron Pig to do good. Why then should he go and to all whom it may concern, just and hide himself when his advice why the Englishman is less popular in might be sought in the future by one Canada than the Scotchman, the Irishwho is not too old to learn? Almost man, or the Welshman. It is because anyone can pull down a house, but it he possesses a quality lacking in the requires a skilled workman to make a other three-he is the most silent of good job in erecting one. There are them all. It is not necessary to enum-CALESMAN TO INTRODUCE THE lots of critics, some of whom we would erate the excellent reasons given why greatest seller of year. It's the unteachable know-it-all that is disliked, and it makes very little difference what the nationality is. One great trouble with the man who knows it all is that he never knows enough to know that he doesn't know anything.

(Saturday Night.)

Why is the Englishman not as well liked in Canada as the Scotchman, the Irishman or the Welshman? This question has had more or less discussion at different times, but the London Spectator comes back at it again, farm, as they do it in London-where and answers it in a way that calls for comment in these columns devoted to Against Englishmen generally, the the interests of plain truth. The Spectator takes up the subject because of dice. But thousands of men of a type an article by Mr. J C. Hamilton, in this country cannot evince a sudden the National Review, of which it discover in an out-of-the-way corner of Mr. Hamilton's article, the real secret of the Englishman's unpopularity, and proceeds to explain the whole thing to its readers, to Mr. Hamilton adapted for export. It has no doubt at all but that it knows Mr. Hamilton's subject ARTEMESIA better than Mr. Hamilton knows it. He is on the spot. He is a Canadian, He is one of our leading journalists, and an ardent lover of Great Britain. It is painful to him to have to admit that there is any such thing as a halfformed prejudice against Englishmen -or a class of them-in Canada, and he would like to put forward explanations in the National Review that would bring about a better understanding. Along comes the London Spectator, picks up his letter patronizingly, and proceeds to explain the whole trouble to its own satisfaction-but I venture to say not to his, nor to that of any other person on the spot. With the utmost cocksureness The readers would enjoy such a rare pro- silent Englishman against whom any duction. The Chronicle man is not prejudice can be supposed to exist in and early learned his sterling merits. He is not unpopular anywhere in Canada, although sometimes the wish is expressed that he would thaw out a little more quickly than he does. But to show why the Englishman is less you meet him in the clubs, you meet him everywhere, and go out of your way to meet him. Men of this kind are enjoying proofs of their popularity all over the Dominion. The Spectator

there are Englishmen and Englishmen. Many of those who have come out here of recent years are not afflicted with the vice of silence. I asked a man who published such an advertisement as that spoken of why he had engaged two Englishmen in succession as porters, that in each case the man wanted to talk all day instead of attending to his work, that he knew everything and could be taught nothing, Ask an Ontario farmer why he says he does not want an Englishman as his hired help and in nearly every case he will reply that it is because the man does not want to learn, but wants to teach-talks, complains, argues, tells you how things were done at home, and altogether is more trouble on the place than a breachy steer. In short any prejudice that exists against the Englishmen has been occasioned by a mere handful of them-not silent ones, but over-talkative ones-who make the mistake of supposing that

The Artemesia Fall Fair was held in Priceville on Thursday and Friday of last week. The weather was none too favorable, Thursday being rather wet and Friday a little on the cold side. Notwithstanding these drawbacks the attendance was fair and the exhibition is regarded generally as up to former years. It is a purely agricultural show and no special attractions are used as drawing cards. In live stock, farm products and domestic manufactures the exhibits were highly creditable. The bread, butter, fruit and fancy work were of a high order, and reflect much ccedit on the community
