This World-Wide War has created demand for newspapers unprecedented in history.

The fact that Canada is in a state of war with the mother country and their Allies against the combined forces of Germany and Austria and the further fact that Canadian troops are on the firing line, will have the effect of increasing our interest in the struggle.

The Chronicle clubbed with The Toronto Morning World will be mailed to subscribers from now to the 1st of January, 1916, for $3.50.

Take advantage of this special offer at once as we are obliged to reserve the right to withdraw it without notice as the ramifications of the war may cause a very rapid increase in the cost of white paper which will mean a much higher price for your newspaper.

LUCILLE LOVE BY-LAW NO. 652

When the detectives arrived the place was vacant, but the young woman was caught on the fire escape and arrested, paroled in the custody of Mr. Roller, the big jeweler. It is a case of suicide, sergeant?"

Daly shook his head.

"Suicide? I should rather guess not. Look at the man's gums. The gun was forced into his mouth and the gums badly bruised in the doing of it. Where can I find this Lucille Love or Loubeque?"

Before the manager could answer the telephone bell tinkled. He turned to the detective excitedly, his hand pressed over the phone mouthpiece.

"A Lieutenant Gibson calling on Miss Love," he explained.

"Tell him to wait."

Richard Gibson was little inclined for cross examination when first the two men approached him. Shamed of his unreasoning jealousy of the girl he loved, he had fought the battle out with himself, coming to the conclusion that there must be a reasonable explanation for her conduct. Sergeant Daly regarded him steadily a moment, then told him the reason for his wishing to know everything. Gibson whirled upon the manager, his face livid with rage, fists clinched.

"And you had her arrested—you had her"—Daly held the arm that was about to strike, soothing him with quieting words.

Gibson flung upon his heel and left the hotel, black hatred, suspicion, fear, a thousand and one emotions in his heart. At the jeweler's his tale caused the proprietor to almost have a stroke of apoplexy.

"A murdered man in her suit while she was in the station house," he gasped. "Then she won't"—He fairly wept in the depths of his emotions. "Then the necklace I sold must have been stolen!" he finally cried, his eyes flashing vindictively.

"Sold—this necklace sold—who bought it?"

"A Hugo Loubeque—never heard of a millionaire by such a name, but he had the two hundred thousand to buy it, and I let it go."

"Hugo Loubeque?" Gibson grasped the amazed man by the shoulders and fairly shook answers from him.

Dick Gibson rushed from the establishment finally, an idea in his head which he cursed himself for not having thought of before—the house where he had last seen Lucille. Might not be was not, this mysterious Loubeque the one whose hand he had seen dragging her from the window?

Breathlessly he darted up to the door and, finding the lock still unrepai red, dashed inside and up the stairs.

Suddenly he stopped, halted abruptly. He could hear no sound, yet was positive some one was close to him, that he was being watched.

"You wished to see me, sir?"

Silent and suave, his great, brooding eyes holding a light of melancholy and sorrow such as the young officer had never witnessed before, appearing as if by magic and now facing him, was Hugo Loubeque.

"Loubeque?" he stammered.

The international spy bowed gravely, his eyes still fastened upon the young man before him.

And as his eyes sought the carpet, away from the magnetic power of the man, all the rage returned to the young officer. This man was the one who had taken his sweetheart. His eyes roved the room, lighting upon a pair of broadsword crossed upon the wall. He caught the smile on the spy's face when he looked again at him and knew his thoughts had been read.

"What have you done with Lucille Love?" he cried.

"Miss Love," murmured Loubeque, his voice taking on a sighing note that fairly tortured the listener's ears—"Miss Love is on a warship bound for Washington, I believe."

"You know a man was murdered in her suit—that she was arrested as a hotel sneak thief?"

"Miss Love has been through many more trying situations than that," answered Loubeque slowly, "since she pitted herself against me."

"Pitted herself against you! Then it was you who stole the papers?"

"Quite so," Hugo Loubeque turned upon his heel, but the iron grip of the officer was upon his shoulder, whirling him about so that their faces met.

Like a panther Gibson leaped across the floor, seizing the broadsword.

Easily, by wrist alone, Loubeque played with the man. His eye held no expression save that of one looking very far away, sad, mournful, distant. That look of indifference only served to madden Gibson doubly.

Furiously he lunged, when suddenly the blade of his adversary whirled, sending out scores of scintillating lights as it danced in the air above his head. He fell back as from a blow, his wrist numbed and deadened by the wrench that had carried the handle of the heavy sword from his grasp. Hugo Loubeque had dropped his own blade to the floor and was studying him quietly, no glimmer in his eyes. Gibson glared over his head. The sword was still swaying from side to side from the fury with which it had been driven into the low hanging wooden beam overhead. Instinctively his hand reached to recover his weapon when Loubeque laid a hand of iron upon his shoulder.

"That will do," he cried sternly. "Be a man, sir." Again that mellowed light drove the light of anger from his eyes. His lips opened and the voice of him was little more than a sigh: "such a man as Miss Lucille Love deserves."

Gibson looked at him, startled, aghast. Once more Loubeque would have spoken when, from below stairs, came the shrill screech of a policeman's whistle, followed almost in-
