BUTTERMAN.
A couple of loads of the young folks of this vicinity drove out to the home of Mr. Jas. Ritchie a couple of weeks ago and spent a pleasant evening.

Mr. Geo. Finney sold his driver last week to Mr. Wm. Black of your town. Mr. Will Brown sold a mare on fair day. There seems to be a little demand for horses yet, although prices are not so good as in former years.

Miss Mary Kennedy returned to Toronto last week, after spending a month at her home.

Mr. Angus McArthur, and Mr. Malcolm McInnes took a bunch of fat cattle to Toronto last week and got fairly good prices.

Mr. Chas. McArthur, who has been confined to his bed for some time, is on the mend, we are glad to say.

Miss Sadie McKeown is at present visiting friends in your town.

Mrs. John Sutherland of Stratford is visiting her sick father, Mr. C. McArthur, at present.

Mr. Thos. Binnie took a business trip down the country week before last.

Mrs. Donald McFarlane, who for a long time has been confined to her bed, is showing a little improvement, we are glad to report.

A prayer meeting will be held at the home of Mrs. Kennedy on Thursday evening of this week.

Mr. Geo. Stewart purchased a nice driver from Mr. Will Atkinson of Durham. George believes in good horses, and you will always find him with the goods at the call of the Bell.

Wonder if the Saugeen Valley scribe got her feed of eggs yet?

THE JOURNEY.

De world keep movin' on its way:

It often hits a snag,

One time it sings a merry lay

An' next it's dancin' rag.

Dar ain' no use o' sorrowin'

About de luck dat comes;

You gotter let dis o' world swing

An' stick close while it hums.

One day de frost is gwinter bite

While snow is pilin' deep,

De wind keeps howlin' thoo de night,

While threatenin' sorrows creep

But lif' yoh head an' sing yoh song

An' watch de changin' sky,

De world is movin' right along

Toward sunshine by an' by.

"WAR"

"No; but do not imagine that it was your beauty that brought him down at long range, and therefore asked to know you. He merely questioned: 'Could you tell me whether a certain Countess Dotzky, formerly an Althaus, probably a relative of yours, is here-to-day? I want to speak to her.' I pointed to you. 'There she sits in the blue dress.' 'Oh,' said he, 'that is she? Will you introduce me?' And I brought him over with no doubt that I would disturb your peace. I mind."

"Such nonsense, Conrad, as though my peace were so easily ruffled! Tilling! What family is that? The name is new to me."

"So you are interested? Perhaps he is the lucky fellow. I who have tried for three months to interest you in me must step aside for this cold-hearted Lieutenant-colonel. Let me warn you, he is without feeling. The Tilling family, I believe, is of Haussarian origin, although his father was an Austrian officer and his mother a Prussian. Did you note his Norwegian accent?"

"He speaks beautiful German."

"You find everything about him beautiful, no doubt," Conrad rose.

"I have heard enough. Let me leave you to dream—I can find plenty of beautiful ladies who—"

"Who will think you charming, Conrad. Indeed there are plenty."

I was uneasy and left the ball early. Surely not to be able to think uninterrupted about the new file d, although I found myself doing it!

At midnight I enriched the red book with the conversation given above, and added my unpleasant doubts that he might even then be sitting at the feet of the princess. I ended my sentence by envying her—not Tilling, oh no!—for being beloved by someone. My waking thought was once more—Tilling. Naturally, had he not made an appointment for that day? For some time nothing had excited me like this visit.

At ten minutes past two the Baron von Tilling was announced.

"As you see, Countess, I am prompt," he said, kissing my hand.

"Luckily, for I am overwhelmed with curiosity to know your news."

"Then, without delay, I will tell you. It is this: I was in the battle of Magenta."

"And you saw Arno die?" I cried.

"Yes. I can tell you of his last moments, and it will be a relief to you. Do not tremble, for if the final had been shocking I would not tell you."

"You take a weight from my heart. Go on, go on!"

"The empty phrase, 'He died as a hero,' I will not use. But it will comfort you to know that he died instantly and without knowing it. We were often together, and he was so confident of his safety. He showed me the pictures of his wife and boy, and insisted that after the campaign I should be his guest. I chanced in the Magenta massacre to be at his side. I will not relate the terrible scenes. The intoxication of the warrior passion had quite seized Dotzky in the thick of the bullet-hail and powder-fog. His eyes were blazing and he was fighting like mad. I, who was sober, saw it all. Suddenly a shell, and ten men—Dotzky among them—fell. He was instantly killed, but many of them shrieked in agony. All but he were shockingly mangled, but we had to leave them, for a charging column came upon us with murderous hurrah, pell-mell over the dead and wounded! Lucky those who were dead! After the battle I found Dotzky, with the placid smile on his face, a painless look, and in the same spot and position. I have meant for several years to come and tell you, and relieve you of a painful uncertainty. But forgive me if I have recalled torturing memories."

The Baron rose to go, and I thanked him while drying my tears: "You cannot know what a relief it is to feel that he died without agony. But stay. A certain tone in your remarks has touched a like strain in my thought. Tell me frankly, you too hate war?"

His face darkened: "Forgive me if I cannot stop to discuss the subject. I am sorry, but I am expected elsewhere."

"How about Major Millersdorf?"

"You may call the whole army roll, but I want none of them." And I turned the subject: "When is the dinner?"

"At five. Come down earlier. Adieu. I must go. Kiss Rudi for me—the future Field-Marshal of the Imperial Army."

Could the dinner be a "cliff, tiresome affair" when the presence of Baron Tilling moved me in such a singular way? We had no occasion to speak at the table, being separated, and even after the dinner, while serving the coffee in the drawing room, the two old generals remained my faithful attendants. I longed to speak to Tilling again about the battle-scene, and hear his sympathetic voice. But the circle left no opportunity for me to talk with him. The conversation ran on the usual topic: "It will soon break out again," suggested one old general.

"Hum," said the other, "next time it will be with Russia."

"Must there always be a next time?" I interrupted, but no one took notice.

"Italy first," persisted my father.

"We must get back Lombardy. We should march into Milan as we did with Father Radetzky in '49. I remember, it was a bright sunny morn—"

"Oh!" I exclaimed in a panic, "we all know the story of the entry into Milan."

"And the story of the brave Hupfauf, also?" asked my father.

"Yes, and it is most revolting."

One of the group broke in diplomatically: "Let us hear it, Althaus."

My father needed no encouragement.

"Hupfauf was a Tyrolean Jager, and the best shot imaginable. He proposed to take four comrades to the roof of the cathedral and shoot down on the rebels. The four did nothing but load, and he shot, hitting the mark every time and killing ninety Italians."

"Horrible!" I exclaimed. "Each one shot had a mother or sweetheart at home, and had a right to his young life."

"My dear, they were all enemies, and that alters the point of view."

"Ah, true," said Dr. Bresser, "the whole world is turned upside down so long as there is racial enmity, and the laws of humanity will receive but slight recognition."

"What do you say, Baron Tilling?" I asked.

"I would have decorated the gallant breast of the man, from the point of view of war ethics, and then put a bullet into his stony heart. He deserved both."

I gave the speaker a grateful look, and, except the doctor, all the guests seemed unpleasantly affected, and a short pause ensued in the talk.

The doctor then turned to my father, asking, "Have you read the new work by the English naturalist, Darwin?"

"I know nothing of it."

"Why, papa," I exclaimed, "that is the book you told me would soon be forgotten by the world."

"And, so far as I am concerned, it is forgotten."

"But," continued the doctor, "it has quite turned the world upside down with its new theory of the origin of only casually met him in public occasionally. But even those meetings and greetings lingered in my thought.

One morning at breakfast my father handed me a parcel: "My dear, here is a parcel for you, and I have a favor to ask."

"A present and a request," I laughed; "that's bribery."

"Yes, I must have three old generals and their wives to dinner, a stiff, tedious affair, and I want you to come to my house and do the honors."

"And you evidently wish to sacrifice your daughter, as the ancient father Agamemnon sacrificed Iphigenia."

"I added a younger element for your sake—Dr. Bresser, for one; he treated me in my last illness, and I wish to show my appreciation. I also invited Lieutenant-Colonel Tillig. Ah, you blush; what is the matter with you?"

"Me?" I said, hiding my confusion by hastily breaking open the parcel.

"It is nothing for you, only a box of lead soldiers for Rudolf."

"But, father, a child of four—"

"Nonsense; I played at soldiers when I was three. My earliest memory is of drums, swords, words of command and marching. That is the way to start the boys to love the profession."

"But my son shall never be a soldier," I interrupted.

"Martha, you know it would be his father's wish."

"The boy belongs to me now, and I object."

"His life shall not be risked in war, he is my only son."

"As an only son I became a soldier; Arno and your brother also. The traditions of both families require it that the offspring of Dotzky and an Althaus shall devote his service to his fatherland."

"His country needs him less than I, and there are other ways of serving one's country."

"If all mothers
