FIRE AT ORANGEVILLE.

A disastrous fire occurred in Orangeville on Wednesday night of last week, which at one time threatened the destruction of the most valuable blocks in the place. It started in a stable about midnight, and spread to the three-storey mercantile block on John McKim, and occupied by him as grocery store and butcher shop, and other offices. The upper flats were used as rooming apartments and several of the occupants had very narrow escapes, some being taken out of upper windows, while others slid down ropes. The entire McKim block was gutted, the loss being placed at $15,000, with insurance of $12,000.

To clean leather use neatsoot oil and beeswax in equal quantities, melted over hot water, with twice their bulk of turpentine. Apply soft, but not liquid, putting on barely enough to absorb. Polish with a soft piece of flannel.

THE STORIED STRAIT

What a wealth of classic myth and ancient legend lies behind the pomp and wreck of history that the shores of the Hellespont, or the Dardanelles, have witnessed! says The Youth' Companion.

Why is it called the "Hellespont"? Because "pontus" means a sea, and because the Greeks named this particular sea for Helle, the goddess who fell into its waters while she was riding through the air above them on the ram of the Golden Fleece. Through the same strait at a later time sailed Jason and Argonauts, in search of the Golden Fleece.

Why the "Dardanelles"? In honour of Dardanus, a city that Greek colonists founded on the strait not far from ancient Ilium, the Troy of classic history. Ilium! The walled city of Priam, the descendant of Dardanus, that the Greeks captured by craft after the ten years' siege of which Homer sang.

The plains where Agamemnon led his Argive hosts echoed last month to the thunder of guns on the British battleship Agamemnon. Near by towers Mount Ida, where Aphrodite won the golden apple, the prize of beauty that led to the wars and woes of Ilium; and where the gods gathered to watch the embattled Greeks and Trojans.

Farther along stood Abydos and Sestos, facing each other on the mile-wide strait that Leander swam once too often to meet his sweetheart Hero, who found his body on the shore. Thither, in 334 B.C. Alexander the Great led Greeks, who sought more worlds to conquer; and there, a century and a half before, Xerxes had crossed on the famous bridge of boats, with his Persian millions—a force that, a year later, went straggling back in overwhelming disaster. There also, in 1355, the Turkish torrent poured across into Europe.

"The sea! The sea!" cried the Greeks who, under Xenophon, had retreated from Persia, and who at last had reached the "Pontus Euxinus," the "hospitable sea," as the Greeks euphemistically called the Black Sea.

Not less grateful is the Sea of Marmora to the English and the French as they leave the demolished forts of the Dardanelles behind them.

Robt. Kerr of Kincardine was fined $50 and costs on pleading guilty to a charge of running an auto while under the influence of liquor on May 24.
