THE RED CROSS COLUMN

The Red Cross and Unearned Increment

The economic theory of unearned increment is customarily applied only to material gains. There is also an unearned increment of national reputation which many people by virtue of citizenship lay claim to...

The Canadian Red Cross Society for instance, is sowing the seeds of Canada's fame and credit, throughout the length and breadth of Europe, from the British Isles to the Balkan and Gaupou Peninsulas...

Every man who has an honest objection to reaping where he has not sown, should busy to receive this Red Cross increment unless he has earned it by work or contribution.

Our Canadian Red Cross Society is giving us a reputation for patriotism and humanitarianism. No Canadian can with justice receive that war profit unless he has given the Red Cross an equivalent.

The Red Cross hospital train has played a great part in lessening the discomforts of the wounded. Thanks to this means of transportation, the wounded have been transferred to base hospitals with a minimum of suffering.

The following is an interesting description of one of these trains which has appeared in an English publication. In this connection it is of interest to remember that one of these hospital trains was equipped by the Canadian Red Cross at the outbreak of war, and is now on active service.

The first coach of the train is the office of the quarter-sergeant, then came the hospital coaches, which are like hospital wards, with clean bed linen and the small comforts of a well organized institution. The beds are supported on brackets in three tiers, and those brackets are so constructed that the bed can be taken out and carried out of the patient from his stretcher is rendered an easy process.

After the ward coaches come coaches for nurses and orderlies and a kitchen coach that might well awaken the envy of a housewife. Everything that the heart of a cook could desire is here in its right place, easy of access, made to the very shape that seems most useful and satisfactory.

The sleeping quarters of the medical and nursing staff are in the next coach, and these are curtained off from the passage, which, of course, runs the whole length of the train. Here, too, are dining-rooms, the seats of which can actually be converted into beds.

The train has in all 14 coaches. It has a most ample supply of hot water, each kitchen has 90 gallons of cold and 60 gallons of hot water; each hospital coach has 50 gallons cold and 6 gallons of drinking water in a separate tank.

The Princess Christian train was collected for by its donor and was then handed over to the War Office. Then the flour millers of the United Kingdom, who had raised a large sum of money for the Red Cross work, decided to devote about $24,000 to provide two complete hospital trains for the Red Cross.

Loading the Train

The "Front" for an hospital train means one or other of about a score of towns mentioned as "Rail-head," situated behind the firing line, within sound of the guns, where casualty clearing stations have been erected for the purpose of concentrating the wounded brought off the field.

When the train reaches he rail-head the ambulance convoys come to it with their freight of wounded men. This is an impressive moment. Instantly the train becomes the scene of great activity.
