This sermon was delivered in the year 1768, long before the Bostonese took it into their heads to sever diplomatic relations between the American colonies and their Uncle George, the English king.

This particular colored man was apprehended, tried and sentenced to be hanged by the neck. History does not give the full name of the colored man who was preached to with a rope around his neck and a grave dug within sight, but in the sermon he is referred to as Arthur, or more specifically, and with a view to giving Arthur a tip that there was no slip of the noose in his case, "The Dying Ar-

Rev. Thaddeus was a great painter with words, and to the unfortunate Arthur he pictured the nether world with old-fashioned colors. To read the sermon even at this day, one with a powerfu imagination can almost sniff the brimstone and can realize how Arthur must have fest as he sat there with the whole of Worcester county occupying the pews. Arthur probably wasn't tick ed to any great extent.

He was informed that a cot made of brimstone, with a mattress lined with live coals that never burned out, was awaiting him in the event of his dying impenitent. According to references in the sermon to the people, there must have been a large number present. In fact, in those days, when prize fights, horse races and even smoking of tobacco were held to be sinfui, seeing a murderer off on his ast journey was about the only sporting event of the times, and the people flocked out in large numbers to see the trap sprung and the victim
