On our way we met an elderly Englishman whose coat showed indications of having seen a considerable amount of service, who greeted us with an amused grin which seemed to say you Canadians call us "greenhorns" and "tenderfeet" but it is our turn to laugh now. One of the first things to strike the visitor is the narrowness of many of the streets adjoining the warf. We saw some fine stone houses, and one beautiful square, but our stay in the city was too short for us to gather any true conception of its size or beauty.

> On Saturday we set out for Edinbridges, and often surrounded with summit of the distant ridge. At times the train moved along the surface of the earth, sometimes the enbankment raised it above the surface, and every few miles it tunneled its way under the hill. Onward, ever onward, we went. The green hedges gave place to stone dykes, the tertile fields to stone-covered and rocky soil. The many old kilns we passed, together with an occasional modern one, revealed the fact that we were in a limestone country. Onward still and the Cheviot Hills came into view and the train
