COLLECTING SNAKE VENOM. Dangerous Occupation That Requires a Steady Hand. A corba when thoroughly roused to anger is by no means a gentle creature, says the Cornhill Magazine. He was now a most formidable beast to approach, striking out desperately at every movable thing within and even out of his reach. But even in this condition Kullan had no difficulty in seizing the largest of cobras. He would hold up and shake a rag in his left hand. On this the infuriated reptile would rivet its gaze. With his right hand behind the man would then suddenly seize it round the neck about three inches below the head and an assistant would fasten firmly on to its tail to prevent it from winding round Kullan's arm. His right hand would then slide forward till he had fastened his fingers round the neck just behind the jaw. He would then insert the rim of a watch glass between the jaws, the grip on the neck would be slightly relaxed and the serpent would viciously close its jaws on the watch glass, and in doing so squirt the whole of its venom through the tiny holes of fangs into the concavity of the glass.

N. C. POLSON & CO., Manufacturing Chemist, Kingston, Ont., Can. EDUCATION OF A PRINCE.

The King of Italy Was Brought Up by Margherita.

From a child Victor Emmanuel III. has been accustomed to submit to all the state ceremonial and all the exformalities which hedge round the public appearances of royalty. While King Humbert usuway and drove off in a small carriage accompanied by his valet, trumpets in the beginning. announced the state carriage of the Queen and the young prince. The palace gates were thrown open, soldiers presented arms and the little prince was taught by his mother to acknowledge the huzzas of his future subjects. A king, she said, should constantly see his people and be seen by them.

Queen Margherita had entire charge of her son's education until he was 12 years old. She gave him a love of literature and the fine arts which he has continued to cultivate through all the years of his military career. He is an accomplished linguist, speak-ing English, French and German with great fluency. He is an enthusiastic collector of coins and medals.

In any estimate of the new king's character, the diverse influences which guided his education must be taken into account. Queen Margherita insisted that a King of Rome living within sight of the ruins of the forum and reigning over the country of should be an archaeologist, an artist before all else the military education of his son, and considered as first essential that a King of Rome should follow the warlike traditions of the
