A moment later there bustled into the room a short, stocky, gray-haired man, who looked as though he were fully experienced in the woes and griefs of humanity, but not therefore moved to any degree of sympathy. He noted the black eye in a moment, and, without waiting for any explanation, drew the victim of the cable car accident over to the light and carefully looked the bruise

"It's a case of hurry with me," said the man with the bad eye, "so I'll take the paint."

"A matter of perfect indifference to me,' said the painter of black eyes as he took the palette down from the wall. He squeezed out a drop of white paint from a tube, and then, selecting a pigment already mixed that seemed to be about the right shade, he carefully added a small portion of color. "There's a scraped place I'll have to fix up,' he said as he scanned the surface he had to decorate. "I'll get that smoothed out now.' "Whatever you do," said the visitor, "be clean about it; I don't want any infection in that scratch." "Will you leave this to me," said the old eye painter, irritably, and with just a trace of offended pride. "This isn't the first case of this sort I've handled, and yet every man that comes in here seems to think he's the first man that ever had a black eye. There'll be nothing the matter

Then the man in the chair fronted the mirror and scanned his features closely and carefully. He was fully satisfied. He had entered the place with an eye that could be seen to be black three blocks away. Now only a close inspection could show that anything at all was the matter with his face. There was a slight graze the powder had not overcome, but only a close scrutiny could reveal it. To all appearances there was nothing whatever the matter with him.
