Circumscribed though the life of a Chinese woman may be, and differing so sharply in detail from accepted standards elsewhere as to make it seem almost intolerable, it has compensations of some weight. The privation, drudgery, and subordination to which a Chinese woman is subject, come when she has youth and strength and buoyant vigor. As these depart and she needs relief, social and family custom provides it, and with advancing years her cares lighten, her comforts increase, and her afternoon is pillowed for her.

When one at home looks after parents it is a matter of special and admiring comment, as though the benefit, while not undeserved, was yet conferred by favor and was specially meritorious. In China, no merit attaches to a duty so obvious. children failed to make comfortable the declining years of parents they would be disgraced. Ancestral worship is dictated by motives that have regard for the welfare of ancestors, immediate and living, as well as for remote ones; and no obligation is so sacredly held or so faithfully observed by the people at large. Theirs is a religion that
