ago Schmidt lived with his grandparents on their estate. The old man was anxious that Frederick marry a certain very wealthy woman, to whom the young man had taken a strange dislike.

He was unreasonable, and, after a stormy scene, young Frederick left for America.

Being ignorant of American customs and the English language he found it impossible to obtain other than unskilled employment. He travelled all over this country, working in various places and occasionally writing home. The old man at last relented and wrote for him to return and again live with them, but, knowing that the old man would tion upon him, the youth stayed here. The old man made his will, and therein is a clause that provides that if at his (the grandfather's) death Frederick is not married the estate goes to the church and charitable institutions. The old man is now in feeble health and Frederick realizes that unless he soon acquires a partner the fortune may slip through his fingers. He is determined, however, not to marry any weman who shall not be willing to face with him the batthe of life. He dramatically declares that if ne is not man enough in his overalls to marry any woman he does not want her.
