000000000000000000000 SHOT STEAKS FOR STARVING MAN

(New York Times.) Such a disagreeable storm was raging on Saturday night that no more than a dozen men were found gathered around the stove at the postoffice to wait for the mail from Hinckley. And because a commercial traveller from New York, who was masthead' staying over in order to go hunting | rabbits next day, was present, and ing as if he'd been spanked. 'I wonder because the woodsmen are usually I didn't think of that before. I'll shy in the presence of city strangers, do it." those who had come were unusually quiet. The only semblance of life in the assembly, beyond an occasional remark about the weather, during the first hour or so was when one of the men reached across the counter and picking some crackers from a convenient barrel, said:

" 'Pears like I can't get enough to eat nohow in weather like this. I supper, but I'm hungry enough now to eat dusty crackers."

"I told you that was the worst storm I ever saw along shore, and set it was. But the terror of it was not in the wind. The temperature was what killed. Why, every time the waves washed across the wreck the water froze in a coat of ice wherever it touched. And there the erew of that schooner were up aloft with the wind piercing through them and the spray reaching up to cover them with ice, while the roll of the wrock as the waves struck it was enough to fling them clear of all and down in the surf. I never saw such a pitiful sight as the sailors that were in the rigging when I reached the beach.

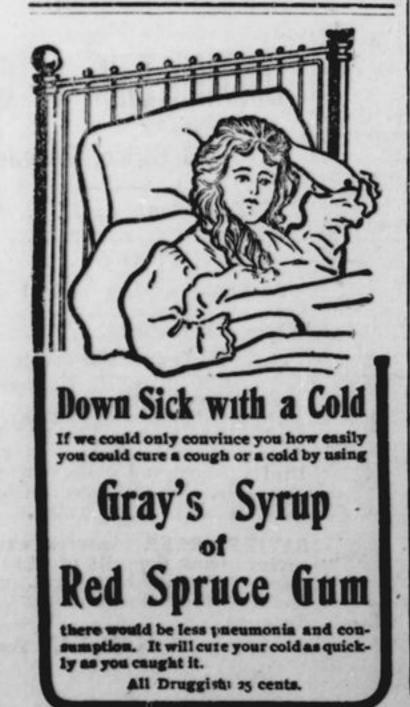

Life Save on Hand

"Of course, the life-saving crew got to the beach a long time ahead of me. The bravest men you ever saw are those life-savers, and they've everything necessary for taking sailors off a wreck, but this time the weather was too much even for them. They brought out their little cannon and lired a line right through the rigging close to the sailors, but when one of the unfortunates let go his hold to reach the line he was so cold that he just tumbled overboard. And inside of ten minutes after he dropped all but one of the others had fallen as he did. It was shocking. "But the most remarkable part of this story is yet to be told. The one that was left on the wreck had climbed up to the cross-trees, where the topsail was furled, and, after slacking away handsomely on the gasket (that is the rope that tied the sail into a tight wad), he worked his way into the wad as if it were a bag. And there he was out of the wind and clear of the spray. " 'We'll save him, anyway,' said one of the life-savers, and the whole crew went at it with a will, but just as they were launching the lifeboat it was smashed by the ice. Then the sailor stuck his head and shoulders out of the bunt of the sail and began to wave his cap to and fro, making what they call wig-wag signals. The keeper of the life-saving station knew the code, of course, and answered. The sailor signalled:

"'Don't try to get me off till the sea goes down. The mast is sound and I have a good bed in the sail. Just

While the general opinion of those supposed to be authorities on this "It was the wreck of the schooner matter has been that the habit of juice on food will be washed aside, thereby facilitating absorption. By bare and is more susceptible to further action of the gastric juice. During the period of rest phlegm or mucus is deposited on the walls of the stomach. This phlegm, being very tenacious, prevents the free flow of gastric juice for some time, hence delays digestion. A drink of water before meals is recommended, because it loosens and washes away this deposit of mucus, thereby permitting the gastric juice to attack the food as it enters the stomach.

The King's Shilling.

Rather curiously, it appears, that the new King Edward shilling has found its way to London from Belglum. While not in general circulation as yet in the Anglo-Saxon capital, a few of them were paid out in the city within the last few days, having arrived in a consignment of coins received from abroad. The Bank of England, it seems, was not aware that there had been a new issue from the royal mint. The new coin has the advantage of being at least original in design, and, while severely plain, on the obverse, is sufficiently decorative in its arrangement to lead us to hope that the medallists who have charge of the designing and cutting of the dies from which the British coins are struck are learning something of the delicacies of the art from the French.

It is to be presumed that they will shortly be in general circulation, though further inquiry at the bank draws forth no further information as to when this may be expected, and the puzzle is still ansolved as to how the coins actually made their appearance abroad before they were known in Lon-

ANCIENT ADVERTISEMENTS

How the Old Romans Solicited Public Patronage.

Latin inscriptions, advertisements class, says Macmillan's Magazine. Here is one near Rome: "If you want inscriptions made, or have any need of marble work, you'll get it here." Another enterprising man at Bologna announces: "A bath in town similar notice meets us only eight! miles from Rome, where, of course, most of the customers would be able to know whether they really had "town style" or not.

A curious example comes from Lyons, which may be paraphrased thus: "Here Mercury promises probed and breakfast. He who has been here before will be treated all the better a second time. Stranger, settle on your lodging beforehand."

A more independent tone is taken by another innkeeper, who doesn't hesitate to declare that his house is not intended for people of moderate means. "If you live in good style, here's the house for you; if in poor fashion, I'll put up with you, but I shall be ashamed of having you." Perhaps there are a good many modern hotels conducted on this principle, but the proprietors are not, as a rule, quite so frank in expressing their sentiments.

THE TRAVELLING NUNS.

A Curious Story From Hungary by Way of London.

A short time since a wealthy Hungarian magnate offered the hospitality of his house to two traveling nuns-an elderly lady in spectacles, who said she was the reverend mother of the convent, and a young nun, lately professed, who, in the words of the official report, "was as pretty as a picture." The pair said that they were collecting money, and during the five weeks of their gether a considerable sum, which, they explained, was for the convent which they were building. The magnate's family were enchanted with the two vestals, and his wife used to kiss them both every morning and evening, and never undertook any important step without consulting the reverend mother. At last they suddenly vanished, and with them a number of diamonds and other portable valuables; and when discovered and arrested the magnate's good lady was covered with shame to think that she had been kissing a male ruffian twice a day for five weeks.-Westminster Gazette
