She had sunk low in a deep courtesy before the Queen and after kissing her royal hand was in the act of rising when she found her upward progress un-accountably arrested. Again and again she made the attempt to recover the perpendicular, growing hotter and more confused at each attempt, and finally, while making a desperate effort, the good lady lost her precarious balance and sat down heavily on the floor. In a moment one of the court officials in attendance hastened to her rescue, and she was with difficulty and amid scarcely suppressed merriment restored to her feet again. Her disaster had been quite innocently caused by the lady who was coming after her standing on her train, and, if looks could kill, that lady would certainly have been annihilated by the withering glance cast at her by the dowager as she swept out of the

In another case it is said that while a certain highly placed lady was in the act of kissing the Queen's hand a substantial portion of her front hair became detached and fell on the floor at the royal feet, leaving the lady with a frontal exposure more eloquent of intellect than beauty. To the credit of this unhapy lady let it be recorded that she calmly stooped, picked up the vagrant locks and carried them off Angeles and many other California sent to the grocery store the other without a trace of discomposure. The drawing room was over and the royal group was preparing to make its exit when a sound of voices in dispute was heard just outside the door. "But I must go in!" a highpitched voice was heard to exclaim in resolute tones, and a moment later in sailed the belated owner of the voice, flushed with haste and argument, and made her way toward the royal group. With an encouraging smile the queen turned toward her and extended her hand; the lady courtesied and retired, jubilant at the thought that she had had her way, even in a royal palace.

Less fortunate was a debutante who or the eve of her presentation was slezed with an illness which made it impossible for her to attend the court. Her name was sent in for the next drawing-room, but again she was disappointed, for her father's death made attendance impossible for at least a year, and when at last there seemed a prospect of success at the third attempt she met with a fatal accident in the hunting field and died ! on the very day when she should have made her courtesy to the

But these amusing adventures are by no means confined to the royal presence. The present practice is for a lady when she leaves the throne room to give her name to an official, who telephones for her carriage to be ready for her.
