Love Rules the Court, the Camp, the World.

By Rev. E. J. Hardy, Author of " How to be Happy Though Married.

In Praise of Love.

Love rules without swords and binds without cords. We talk of the power exercised by the Sultan of Turkey or the Emperor of China, but what is it compared with the sway which love holds in court, in camp, and in the world generally? Love "raises the lowly and humbles the great." History records many examples of King Cophetuas marrying beggar maids and ruling according to the wishes of their wives.

Almost every war which has been waged in the world, since the one for Heien of Troy, has been directly or indirectly caused by women. If this be too much to say, it is at least | his line, was reclaimed from dissipacertain that women could have pre- tion and disreputable connections by vented these wars from taking place. an early marriage, which he conages the bright gyes of women Wales. Drinking toasts is a stupid custom, staying too long she merely sends | Neglige shirts are made this year but there is one toast which always seems to me to be excusable, and that is the toast to sweethearts and wives. The word "sweetheart" is a beautifully expressive one, and is associated with the best feelings of our nature, and with the brightest period of our life. When a young man falls in love his heart is put to school, and our hearts need schooling even more than do our heads. To have loved a good woman is to have received a liberal education, and it would seem that this means of culture is enjoyed by that manysided man, the present Emperor of Germany. The domestic virtues of his wife help him to be the ruler he is. It was at Prinkenau, then the palace of the Grand Duke Frederick, that Prince William saw his future bride. He had arrived as a guest at the castle sooner than he was expected, and while strolling in the park came upon a summer house, into which he penetrated. There he saw a fair-haired girl asleep in a hammock, and thought it only right to'withdraw. Afterward when he met her inside the castle he recognized the sleeper in the Princess Augusta Victoria, and was so impressed used frequently to tell her, in joke, more or less disastrous results. with her naturalness and charm | that he had married her for her | Men could never so thoroughly acthat he engaged himself to her in money, to which she would reply, custom themselves to the style as marriage. I have lived in them I loved, labored for them I loved, loved them for whom I labored." Well might Sir Thomas More, who used these words, add; "My labor hath not been in vain," for to say nothing of its effect upon others how it must have disciplined his own character. "Family life," says Sainte Beuve, "may be full of thorns and cares, but they are fruitful; all others are dry thorns." And again : "If a man's home at a certain perled of life does not contain children it will probably be found filled with follies or vices.

In a speech upon woman's rights. a lady orator exclaimed; "It is well krown that Solomon owed his wisdom to the number of his wives!" This is too much, but it is an undoubted fact that the success or failure of most men depends to very large extent upon the kind of women they marry. And this we think is especially true in reference to men of genius. An intellectual life, however successful, requires the softening influence of a happy marriage to prevent its becoming sour and cynical. Tom More spoke for a large number of men of genius when he said that, having experienced the emptiness of applause and popugive or take away.
