CALENDAR MAKERS BUSY.

Many Millions are Published—High-Priced Pictures in Some of Them. One American patent medicine firm alone issues 7,000,000 calendars a year—nearly one in ten to the population in the United States.

Some calendar buyers like to get the prettiest and most artistic designs procurable, and they only print their names upon the calendar in small and inconspicuous type, perhaps on the back.

The making of calendars is a profitable business for artists who know how to hit upon popular ideas and subjects. An effective design will fetch anything from $30 to $250, and there are historic cases in the calendar business where as much as $400 or $500 have been paid.

"Sometimes," said a publisher, "a customer will come to us and say that he wants a calendar designed by a famous artist, whose work he happens especially to admire. He will take nothing for granted, and even the artist is willing to do the work, which is not always the case, its cost is frightful.

"I heard of a rich Chicago manufacturer who paid $100,000 for a sketch to a well known French artist for a very ordinary calendar, which made no impression at all on the public. Another man went to a rival of mine and demanded a calendar illustrated by Leighton, the former President of the Royal Academy.

"It was impossible to get it. A representative was sent to England to see Leighton, and to offer him a big price. He had too much on hand and refused the commission."

How to Minister to a Mind Diseased and a Body Fatigued.

On the authority of a medical contemporary we are bidden to believe that Shakespeare was entirely wrong when he questioned the power to minister to a mind's diseases. Care it was, according to the old adage, that killed the oat, and though surgeons may skillfully patch up our deficiencies and repair the most alarming bodily damage, yet let worry afflict our minds and trouble weigh down our souls and, so we generally believe, there is no balm or medicine that will help us. However, the medical mind thinks otherwise nowadays, and as we can grapple with once drastic diseases in a wonderful fashion, so, too, can we keep worry from assuming inflammatory symptoms and weakening our mental fibre, if we only follow the advice given and take it in time. What, then, is the patient to do? The course of treatment is simplicity itself and involves no inconvenience. One of the first steps, it seems, is to get quite clear of sympathies and antipathies, and see solitude. Having insured this, a complete change of regimen into easy, "comfy" garments are advised; then the patient must "curl up" into a thoroughly restful position, shut the eyes, draw in the nostrils long, deep breaths quite quietly, and, hey presto! black care will softly and silently vanish away, or, at all events, its victims will be able to get up and do a hand-to-hand struggle with it.

ANIMAL INTELLIGENCE. Bruin Stuffed Leaves in Wound to Stop Flow of Blood. A remarkable bear story is told by J. A. Perry, of this city, who has been hunting in the region of Docewallups River. The evidence of the truth of the tale lies in the office of R. E. Jeffrey, a local attorney, every one of the skin of an enormous black bear is ready to be tanned into a suitable rug. Mr. Perry and a companion occupied with their lives only through the defense of a hunting dog, which attacked the bear when he was biting at the limbs of the prostrate man.

On Monday Mr. Perry was hunting in the woods about three miles from Bruin, on the Docewallups River. His companions were D. J. Smith, who owns a farm in that vicinity, and a hunting dog, to which he is greatly attached. At 3 o'clock in the afternoon a bear was seen and Smith fired two shots, the first penetrating the lungs, while the second broke the fore leg. The bear, however, got away in the brush.

After following the animal for an hour, he was discerned in the woods ahead, and the two hunters went forward rapidly. Bruin was quicker, for he came toward them on his hind legs, mad with rage. When he was within ten feet of Smith, who was the only one armed, the lock on his gun snapped, and he was knocked down before he could explode the second barrel. The bear seized the man by the throat and began to tear the flesh. At once the dog was upon the infuriated bear, and so distracted its attention that he left Smith and attacked Perry, who was standing a few feet away, helpless. He threw one arm about a sapling and sustained the full weight of the bear, who tried to throw him to the ground with his great forepaw, but by the old means of getting a death grip about the waist. The faithful dog made another attack and prevented Perry's fall until Smith had recovered sufficiently to shoot the animal through the heart.

The dog was practically unhurt, owing to his agility, but the wounds of the hunters are serious and are being escaped being fatal. The bear was a large one, and his hide thick and of fine fur. When the body was skinned a remarkable evidence of the bear's sagacity was shown in the fact that he had stuffed half a bucketful of man's leaves in the first wound he had received. Eunning along through the trees, he had evidently swooped the leaves up from the ground with his uninjured forepaw and crowded them into the gaping wound in his side to stop the flow of blood. Finally, when he saw escape was impossible, he became mad with rage, and tried to force the hand-to-hand battle with his pursuers.—Seattle Post-Intelligencer.
