VENICE :: GONDOLAS

www.www.www.www.ww If you are good at finding darksome little bringes, and do not mind walking on the narrow footpaths skirting the houses, you can go many a crooked mile dry-shod in Venice. In such wanderings it is amusing to come upon a squero, where goudolas are built and repaired. The water approach to one of these dock-yards is by a long, mud-plastered slope, at the top of which the black gondolas drawn up for repair look like go many stranded whales. Here are floods of black paint and pots of pitch and tallow, always boiling and was your pastor." bubbling.

In former times the Venetian craft were made of walnut, beautifully carved by hand, but common pine is mostly used at present. The boards must be thin, well-seasoned, and as that science has been able to cure in all its free from knots as possible. The regulation coat of black paint is not applied to a gondola until the boat is a year old, the unpainted state being a proof of newness, as well as disclosing any knots or other imperfections. After the defects are covered with paint the boat loses in value.

A gondola is usually 36 feet long. Only a small portion of the flat bottom rests in the water; prow and stern slope sharply upward, and the craft turns as eas.iy as if on a pivot. So fully under control is it that there are only two places in all the intri-canals where gondolas cannot passone hard by the Phoenix Theatre, and the other near the Palazzo Moce-

A good gondola has three charac- i teristics , it draws little water, turns [gondoller. At the prow is the graceful ferro with its six teeth, standing high as the roof of the cabin, and serving as guide to the goldolier in | race, and the man who makes it may passing under a low bridge, as a | be only putting together the labor of cat's whiskers are said to give her | thousands who went before him, says warning of a tight squeeze of her body in an unfamiliar hole. Most persons have had, at one quent and thorough polishing, twice time of another, the sort of experia day, at least, in damp weather, and a good gondolier may be known by the gleam on his ferro.

Astern is the branched prop for the sculling-pole, by which the gondoller sends his boat's black nose prying into every corner of the water city. The snug little cabin, called the feize, holding two or four passengers, is it was cold, and put on my overcovered with black cloth, tufted and | coat -- ' fringed with black, and is provided generously with soft, black leather cushions-all very hearse-like in appearance, save for the brass seaborses and dolphins sporting among the straps and tassels. It is carpeted and curtained, and usually the picture of a saint hangs above the cushions. The feize, with all its belongings, costs $100; and the gondoia complete in all its equipments has a But go on with your story, dear; I value of about $250.

The general blackness dates from the 16th century, when the republic of Venice issued an order that all gondolas, save those of foreign embassadors, should be black-this as a check upon the great extravagance in decoration which had become the fashion. With woodwork heavily gilded and carved, ornaments of silver and gold, pale blue his face.
