I was glad to see how the sailors generally regarded them as birds of good omen, and in nowise to be meddled with. Indeed, in my day not a few seamen really looked upon them as the spirits of departed sailors, who never weary, flitted over the bright pure sea eternally. But then many seamen thus regarded albatros also, yet I never saw the same sincere reluctance to do them harm as was always evinced towards the stormy petrel. Once I saw a man, a second mate, wearying for something to do, catch one of the pretty creatures by means of a thickly-tarred roping twine attached to a bait of pork, which was hooked on to the end of a fishing line. The little bird, fluttering over the meat and continually touching the water with its feet, as is its wont, got them entangled in the sticky twine and was hauled in, all bedaggled, its bright vivacity gone

(New York Times)

In these days, when railways are run more for what there is in them for a favored few than for the accommodation of the genera? public, it may be interesting to recall the fact that there is right here in North America a "holy railroad." This is a little line 22 miles long, from Quebec to Ste Anne De Beaupre. It is sacred because it claims to run "especially for the accommodation of pilgrims" and, above all, because at its opening a few years since it was formally blessed with all its belongings by Cardinal Taschereau. Minutes.

In a town which contains the chief plant of one of the biggest manufacturing corporations of the country, every Friday at 8 a. m., a policeman emerges from the door of a bank closely guarding three men who cross the sidewalk enter a carriage with bulky packages, and are driven rapidly away. When the office of the corporation is reached. three or four workmen come forward and help the men in the carriage to carry the packages to the paymaster's department. There they dump bills, silver dollars, halves, quarters and cents to the amount of $120,000 upon one of the tables.

Then every one gets busy. It is 8.15 o'clock by the big office clock, and that great pile of mixed money must be counted and verified to the last cent, and then be distributed into 10,000 envelopes in amounts of wide variation; and this must be accomplished by two

HOTEL ECONOMIES. Exhaust Steam Made to Cook, Heat and

The principle of the modern engineer is to successively pass steam through as many contrivances as possible in order to extract the greatest amount of heat. There are many plants of modern construction, the writer having the refrigerating machinery of a large brewery in mind, where the capacity has been doubled by machinery which utilizes the exhaust steam of the old-time refrigerating engines. The heating plant of the new Savoy hotel, on the Strand, London is an example of what can be done in this direction. The steam exhaust of the engines furnishing power for the electric lighting and elevator service is made to do all the heating of the building, this being the usual practice nowadays in office buildings. The air circulated by the power fans in winter time is also heated by being made to pass over steam coils containing the exhaust steam. Most of the cooking is also done by means of While a young woman lay dying at exhaust steam, including grillers, hot closets, coffee urns, hot milk urns and like the paradoxical satyr of the first reader, in addition to doing all the heating of the establishment, the waste

BOARDING BIRDS.

There is a young woman in Philadelphia who realizes a snug little sum during the summer months by boarding birds for people who close up their houses during the heated term and go into the country. The feathered pets must be cared for and the sum charged for looking after them is so small that the young caretaker has no trouble in getting all the birds she can properly attend to. She understands the habits of the little songsters thoroughly and knows exactly what to do for them in case of minor ailments, having made a study of bird life. She has a large room in the house which serves the purpose of an aviary and there spends nearly all her time. She is using the money she receives from the owners of her little charges in giving herself a professional education. - Philadelphia
