When a baby is a month old it is taken to the favorite Shinto temple of the parents, where it formally receives its name and is registered by the priest, an act equivalent to baptism among us. The parents leave an offering, as much as they can afford, to pay for the ceremony and for the prayers that are offered to propitiate the gods in favor of the little one. Then they go from house to house among their friends exhibiting the baby and are entertained with cakes, sweet meats and tea. The baby receives presents of paper dogs, which are emblems of good health. "Healthy as a dog," is a Japanese proverb. Friends are invited to the house of their parents on the evening of the same way and are entertained in a simple way.

The next day baby is strapped to the back of an elder brother or sister, a strip of cotton cloth being passed under its arms and around its knees, and its life for the next two or three years is spent in that position. MINING RUBIES IN BURMA.

The system practised for obtaining rubies in the mining districts in Burma is of the most primitive description. The mining shafts are simply holes about two feet square sunk to a depth varying up to 50 or 60 feet. The shoring up of the walls of the shafts is most crude, the sides being supported by posts at the corners and branches of small trees secured against the sides by stout sticks. The miner carries a tin pot, similar in the world like then? shape to a blunt-ended cone, on his head. Moon Phases.

The phases of the moon may be explained by the fact that the moon is a dark spherical body which shines only by reflected light. The new moon, popularly so called, is seen only when the sky is sufficiently dark to present a complete outline of the disk. This illumination is due to the light which comes first from the sun, is reflected to the earth and back to the moon and thence to the earth. What we really see is the earth light shining on the moon.
