> Hunter's Bullets May Not Stop the Brute's Advance.

> The disturbing element in hunting alephant or seledang or rhino has been always, to me at least, the feeling of uncertainty as to whether or not I could stop the animal if I wounded it and it charged me, as it did on an average of once in three times. Based on my experience, therefore, I should place the elephant first and the rhino third after the seladang, which is fully as formidable as the Capt Buffalo, and is miscalled the bison all over India. Each of these animals is dangerous on different and individual ground; the elephant, though less likely to charge than any of the others, is terrifying because of his enormous strengta, which stops at no obstacle, and the extreme difficulty of reaching a vital spot, especially if, with trunk tightly coiled, he is coming your way.

I know of no sensation more awsome than standing ankle deep in clinging mud in dense cover, with the jungle crashing around you as though the entire forest was toppling as a standard toppling topplin toppling, as the elephant you have wounded comes smashing his way in your direction. The seladang is dangerous, partly because if the thick jungle he seeks when wounded, but more especially because of his tremendous vitality and his usual, though not invariable, babit of awaiting the hunter on variable, habit of awaiting the hunter on his tracks, and charging suddenly, swiftly and viciously. It requires close and hard shooting to bring down one of these six foot specimens of Oriental cattle.

The danger of the tiger and of the lion is in their lightning activity and ferocious strength, but you have the shoulder, in addition to the head shot, if broadside; or if ceived $25,000 by public subscription coming on, the chest, all sure to stop if well placed. The reason the rhino is so formidable placed. The reason the rhino is so formidable placed. is because the vulnerable spots are so hard to reach.
