The Christian Master.

ciently into the dealings of master with servant. Whatever the cause, the fact remains that the hard, grasping, selfish, and; therefore, unchristian, master, like the poor, is always with us.

However different the circumstances and customs may have been in Job's time, human nature never changes. That is the same now as it was then-masters still "despise the cause of their servants." There always have been, and there al ways will be, class distinctions-the rich and the poor ,the educated and the ignorant, the master and the servant; but for what reason should they not have counterbalancing virtues? The line of distinction was as finely drawn in the old feudal times as it is now; but what do we find? The bond between master and servant was much closer then than now, and, as a result, the tender relationship was mutual advantage strengthened by the feeling of mutual depend-

Who does not know of the uncouth employer who never bids his workman the homely "good morning," and if he speaks at all it is a word of reproach, accompanied very often by a look of suspicion? Think of the employer who has no interest in his workpeople beyond what he can obtain by the labor of those whom he is pleased to call his "hands." sive language to their servants, such as they would scarcely dare to fling at of the unsympathetic master, who never takes the slightest interest in the families of those he employs, and when appealed to in some case of distress, coldly replies: "What have I got to do with them?" Again, there is the master who does things largely. I mean the man who say, a famine fund, or towards the erection of a monument to some politician, in order that his name may figure in large print in a public subscription list, but who fails to understand that charity which begins nearest home; that man who leaves his office and employees every afternoon for his palatial residence, not caring what becomes of those who helped him to his affluence. These are not exaggerated examples of the un- James J. Burns Cured by Dodd's christian master.

But what are the characteristics of the Christian master? Many of the little courtesies of life may be shown to those who work for us, without any loss of dignity. The gracious salutation; the quick sympathy in the men's amusement; the kind inquiry about home affairs; the "day off," ungrudgingly given; consulting generally the real interest of the men as the master would consuit his own; not dealing with men as mere to have an increased wage extorted, but tirely satisfactory. Of all the despicable methods adopted by members of the New York police force to add to their income outside of legitituring districts, we hear much of the mate sources, there is none quite so mean conflict between employer and employed and worthy of contempt as the practice as touching the evil of under-payment of arresting women for blackmailing purand of over hours of labor. Signatures of the Future.

The time will probably come when the natural signature, the impression of the thumb or finger tip, will be widely used for purposes of identification. If the thumb be lightly pressed upon a surface smeared with printing ink and then pressed upon clean paper an impression is obtained which is distinctive for the particular individual who owns the member. No two thumbs or fingers are alike in the arrangement of their multitudinous lines; each, therefore, is a seal which is unique and a seal which cannot readily be mislaid or lost. The French police use this test to assure themselves of the identity of a prisoner; but surely the system could be usefully extended. A newspaper correspondent who recently pleaded for such an extension of the thumb mark test stated that once when abroad he was in great straits for monev. although he held checks for a considerable amount, simply because he could not prove his identity. If the local banker had only had an impression of his finger tip, as well as authority to pay, all difficulty would at once have

Princess aMrgaret of England is al most a year older than her future husband, Prince Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, Duke of Scania. Not being a daughter of the sovereign or even of the heir apparent, she will not receive from the nation the dowry of $150,000, and the further annuity of $30,000, which was granted to all the daughters of the late Queen Victoria on their marriage, But for all that she will not be portionless. It is true that her father, the Duke of Connaught, may not have been able to save much from the allowance of $125,-00 a year which he has been receiving from the nation since his marriage, to which, of course, must be added the $20,-000 of salary now paid to him as inspector general of the British army. But the Duchess of Connaught inherited a considerable share of the immense fortune of her father, Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia, the Red Prince, and one of the richest royal personages of Europe, besides which Queen Victoria made special provision for the children of the Duke of Connaught, and for other of her grandchildren, so that it is estimated that Princess Margaret will have on her marriage an allowance of her own amounting to about $20,000 a year.
