Wounded men have existed somehow amid the dead under these con- | choor house t'moranight?" ditions, and have been found yet alive after twelve days. The searchlight, which preserves perpetual daylight on the battle ground, the engineering of scientific trenches, machine guns, rifles point blank at 200 yards and with a range of 2,000-these things have made war more terrible now than ever before in history. "Red Cross societies," says Villiers, "and scientific text books-they sound well and look pretty, but as for 'humane warfare,' was there ever put into words a mightier sarcasm?" Villiers has been through many campaigns, and knows what he is talking about. The man who knows nothing of war but what he has read in heroes' tales imagines there is nothing easier than for a truce to be arranged for the burial of the dead, while the Red Cross people on their errands of mercy go safely about picking up the wounded. That simple order of things never existed, perhaps. But now it is much worse. Two army corps confront each other, and by means of scientific trenches get within a distance sometimes and at some points of one hundred yards. Not a living thing can show itself above the surface. These opposing fighters are under telephonic orders of a commander twenty miles away-the front of battle may be ten or forty miles long. The order may come ! from one side to rush the trenches of the ! other. Men are massed in the trench for a sudden rush, and they know they go to almost certain death. To be wounded is considered worse than to be killed in such a charge. It means a lingering, death within fifty yards of a man's own army, or the man lying in the open gets | bullet after bullet, but none in a vital spot to end his suffering. There can be no truce where armies are in this close and deadly grip-with the fate of nations at stake. War is what it is, and it tineted him
