In the centre of the main hall is a large flying cage, 15 by 36 feet, by 18 in height, which will contain 300 or 400 birds of many species. Besides the indoor cages there are outdoor ones for the hardier birds such as those who live in cold regions. there will be over 75 inclosures. All the decorations have been carefully worked out with regard to their appropriateness for example, a terra cotta frieze of cockatoos extending quite around the outside of the building, with figures of horned owls

In this splendid building, which will be as light as the woods and fields themselves, ideal for a dining room a l'Anglaise. many interesting familie sof birds will be housed. In addition to this house, a glass court will soon be built, which will occupy the space betwen the arms of the L, and will bring up the total number of cages to 115. There are many ingenious devices which have been planned especially for this building. Each cage has its separate porcelain drinking and bathing basin, each controlled by individual water pipes. The meshes of the cage wires are a great deal larger than to give an open effect and unobstructed view, without allowing the birds to escape through the wires. The cages will be filled with growing plants and turf, and these will be as appropriate as possible. There is not a small cage in the building and the birds, which will mostly be young ones, should live and thrive and build their nests in this avian place, provided with the best water and food, protected from storm and from enemies, and given plenty of sunlight, the sight of flowers and green plants, and abundance of room in which to fly about.-New York Evening Post.

Benefiting the Public.

In the early days of newspaper publicity most of the advertisers were fakirs. The dishonest, sharper than their plodding contempories, were first to realize the value of the news sheets as a means of getting in touch with money spenders. In the evolution of the art of advertising the primitive conditions have been reversed. The charlatans are in a minute minority. As Walter H. Page, editor of the World's Work, put it in a recent address to the Agate Club, of Chicago: "The idea of the advertisers now is to benefit the public. The old idea was to 'catch' the public."
