Majority Accidental.

On the other hand, it may be argued that the majority against the Government was almost certainly accidental, for it is certain that the bulk of the Unionists cordially approve the Government's Irish policy, and that if the vote on which the Government was defeated were resubmitted it would almost certainly be carried by the full Government majority.

The Times thinks there are very serious reasons that may determine the Ministers to resubmit it, for which there are plenty of precedents. It is of national importance that the extremely important negotiations pending with Japan to prolong and extend the treaty of alliance should be concluded before the Government resigns. There are also other grave foreign and colonial subjects to be considered.
