

IS THE NEGRO INVENTIVE?

The picture of a young negro operating a new motor car that he had invented was printed in one of last week's issues of the St. Louis Globe Democrat. In the account of the negro and his work, the young man was treated with perfect respect, and it was evident that he had made serious efforts to improve the automobile, especially in the matter of economy of gasoline fuel.

The article gives the inventor's name as William Coffey, aged twenty-two, and says of him:

"This youth was born in St. Louis, and attended school here until seventeen years old. He then went to school in a machine shop, spending his leisure hours studying mechanical engineering by correspondence. The car in question is Coffey's third attempt, its two predecessors not coming up quite to the maker's expectations. The first one was sold for $200, and the second was swapped for material with which the present machine was constructed."

Whatever may be the worth of this young man's new device, it is evident that he has a native talent of a mechanical and inventive character. Now, he is a negro. How many negro inventors have thus far appeared in America? Does the race possess inventive genius to any considerable degree? It is probable that the majority of persons would answer that the negro is an inventor was a stranger to them, and that they had not given the matter serious thought for possessing the inventive quality of mind. A Massachusetts lawyer is on record as having said in response to a question from the United States Patent Office, "that he never knew a negro to invent anything he had learned the facts. The case of the young St. Louis negro, which has been reported in the St. Louis newspaper, is by no means isolated and unprecedented."

A few years ago the Patent Office was able to dig out of its records a partial list of 267 patents that had been issued to negroes since the establishment of the office. Twenty-one of these patents were issued between 1865 and the year 1879; there were 15 issued in 1880-85; there were 21 in 1885-90; there were 22 in 1890-95; there were 26 in 1895-1900; there were 22 in 1900-05;
